THE WELSH MUSICAL CONTROVERSY.

There are idosyncrasies of men, and there are idiosyncrasies of race. In neither case must one offer criticism unkindly, as while we know that we are peculiarly fallible ourselves, we must also recollect that unkindness can never effect a satisfactory reform in others. Dictation is not acceptable even to those who may become convinced of the unsuitability of their purposes, and sneering criticism is apt to produce nothing better than resentment. When, therefore, we hear of what appears to us to be retrogade tendencies, let us consider that all history teaches us that backward movements are repeated from time to time, if only that a more conspicuous march forward shall afterwards take place; and that if we would say anything in the way of criticism or remonstrance, we have no need to be harsh, and that we gain nothing if we fail to be considerate towards those with whom we, peradventure, may not agree. With these few remarks I will take leave to refer to the position of Wales in regard to matters musical. Although reputedly a land where the love of poetry and music is predominant, Wales is, just now, giving the musical world some little trouble and fear; and the outbreak on the part of those who claim to be the leaders of Welsh thought cannot be lightly overlooked, while, however, it ought not to be treated in an arbitrary manner. We must not seek to suppress, so much as to convince, a proud little nationality like this of what we may believe to be its errors. When we hear of an inclination being manifested on the part of Welshmen to reject ennobling orchestral music on the ground that the ancient Welsh harp ought to be more prominently before the public as a representative instrument, let us bear in mind for one moment that the old traditions of independence and minstrelsy have a strong influence in Wales, even at the present time. This harp is to many the relic of a bygone day, which Welshmen love to look back upon as glorious. The national instinct is yet strong, and the old harp is a revered symbol, around which there clings many a hallowed poetical fancy, which is cherished from age to age, and takes the mind back into the memorable circumstances of the distant past. As late as the 14th century, there lived the "greatest of the Welsh lyrists"—the famous Dafydd ab Gwillim, and he was a noteworthy resident in the county where the last National Eisteddfold was held. Ab Gwilim had enrolled himself in the order of minstrels, who made each year, like the Provençal troubadours, a circuit of their patrons. Not only in Glamorganshire, where he was recognized as laureate of the shire, but in all South Wales, and especially at Llewellyn's house at Emlyn, the minstrels (with their trichord harps), found a warm welcome. Listen to the poet's fervent sentiments towards his favourite county, and consider how great a hold he—a typical poet—must have obtained upon the affections of his countrymen:—

Hear me, Summer, thou shalt be Bounteous messenger for me.
Fly to Essyllt: hasten forth
From the rude land of the North;
Go, until thou reach the sea,
And the land beloved of me;
Take my greeting, kindly told,
To Glamorgan twenty-fold;
Twice a hundred blessings bear
To Glamorgan true as fair.
From the mountain to the strand,
Pass and compass all the land.
Let her grasses stay thy feet,
Bless her fields of corn and wheat,
Fruitful lakes and fertile dells,
Marble halls where kindness dwells.
There her lords for poets' meed,
Pour the wine and pour the mead;
There in bright continuous band
Orchards stretch across the land;
Birds that sing from tree to tree,
Fill the air with love and glee;
Tangled branches cluster o'er
Leafy wall and flower'd floor;
There the fields as tribute pay
Eight kinds of corn and three of hay—
Fields that stretch from hill to sea,
A cloth of trefoil tapestry,
There the Lord does not withhold
From his poet mead and gold;
Through the palace ever rings
Music of the voice and strings;
Day by day from out the soil
Spring the crops to guerdon toil—
Wheat beneath the labourers' hands,
Wheat to spare for other lands.
Dear Glamorgan by the sea,
Other lands rejoice for thee.

The lays of other days, with their accompaniments, no doubt still ring in the ears of the imaginative Welshman, and he suddenly wakes up to the fact that his beloved harp has been superseded. Then he who, be it observed, in this 19th century, does not forget to stoutly assert his right to claim Monmouth as one of the counties of his native land, reproachfully considers that he has been forgetful of his old traditions. The harp must be replaced, and national institutions must not be Anglicised. Well, in answer to all this, I respectfully submit that the union of England and Wales was accomplished long since, and that, generally speaking, England herself is not more loyal to the British Constitution than Wales. Wales herself has progressed with England in many things; Wales has, to a large extent, adopted the English language, and many of the great Welsh mining districts and ports have been developed by men from other parts of the country. In Wales, as in England, the day of troubadours has gone out of fashion, and the desire for patronage is not now prominent. Neither am I aware that for the sake of "national" sentiment, old tapestries and sculptural remains are searched by modern nations for the correct form of a national instrument. And as to patronage—an idea which, it must be confessed, is associated with the old Welsh harp—are not the colliers about to establish for themselves labour scholarships at the new University College of South Wales? Welshmen do not necessarily lose their nationality by speaking English. Will they lose it by accepting a new meaning in the old dictum recognised by all civilised countries—that art belongs to no age? It is almost idle to fondle the antiquated belongings of the past. Let us respect the music of an earlier day, and let us not be ashamed to recognise the progressive efforts of our ancestors, but do not let us deceive ourselves with false sentiment. The retention of old customs is not an abstract good. Great revolutions are constantly being wrought in society, and all nations undergo changes. Comparing the Welsh nation with what it was several centuries since, the contrast is indeed remarkable. Wales has grown and developed new customs and conditions. Welsh and English are being assimilated, and although certain marks of nationality still remain, the chief distinctions are surely wearing out, and in time the whole of this island will be the abode of English-speaking people. The increased facilities of locomotion lead to this. To put forward, therefore, old theories and symbols is scarcely worthy of the people recently born in Wales. They must recognise the importance and the teaching of the times, and, while tenderly regarding their past history and achievements, they must be up and doing, and ready to show the world that they are not narrow conservatives in art matters; but that, as Welshmen, they are able to hold their own in all respects against all comers. They must not encourage a tendency to rest satisfied with what history says their forefathers accomplished. No one can afford to live in the past. We have improved on the works of others, and we desire that the work of progression will be continued. In conclusion—a National Eisteddfod cannot be creditable unless it is conducted in a broad and liberal spirit. The good that men do lives after them, but it must not be "cribb'd, cabin'd and confin'd," for reposeful admiration: it should rather be recognised as a strong incentive to further deeds of good. The Welsh language, although said to have been spoken in Paradise, is not the universal tongue. Welshmen themselves speak English more and more. In this manner the greatest social barrier is being voluntarily overcome. And the old Welsh harp, no doubt an advance, at a remote period, on previous productions, cannot seriously be put forward by an intelligent nation as an instrument for "all eternal time."

JOHN G. E. ASTLE.

The musical services at St. Cuthbert's, Liverpool, will after to-morrow become a thing of the past, Mr. Banner, the liberal art amateur, who for so long has borne the whole expense of the choir which bears his name, and whose object, and that of his lieutenant, Mr. S. Claude Ridley, has been to render the best ecclesiastical Services and Anthems, having been informed that he must either make the Service so low that any singing at all would be an absurdity, or—go. There is scarcely another town in the kingdom where a gentleman would be found willing to spend hundreds of pounds on such a laudable object as providing the best music for Church-goers, and it is to be hoped that this powerful combination will not be lost to Liverpool, but that another Church may be found where Mr. Banner's devotion to Church music may be better appreciated.

REMINISCENCES OF AN OLD REPORTER.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The "New Philharmonic" Society was started by Dr. Wylde, and the concerts, at first, were held in Exeter Hall, now not only the occasional, but the exclusive locale of the pious folks that attend the "May" and other "religious" meetings in the Strand. Dr. Wylde, to be esteemed by me as a musician of genius and an old confrere of the Corps de Critiques, conducted the "New Philharmonic" concerts, and brought out in 1854 a masterly version of Milton's "Paradise Lost."

After several seasons the Doctor coalesced with M. Wilhelm Ganz, and held a series of "Orchestral" concerts in St. James's Hall. Some differences unhappily arose after a time, and M. Ganz was "left alone in his glory." I much regret the discontinuance of the "Orchestral Concerts" held on the Saturday afternoon, but, as before hinted, M. Ganz could not be expected to entertain the British public at his own and at a very heavy expense. For his "leader," M. Pollitzer, I entertain the highest respect.

Old enough is this poor and nearly superannuated "Reporter" to remember M. Ganz's worthy father as conductor of the German Opera at old Covent Garden Theatre in 1841 and 1842. He was an able chef, and I shall not forget his performance of "Die Zauberflöte," on Saturday, May 21, 1842. Madame Stoeckel Heinefetter and Herr Staudigl undertook the leading parts of these German operas as soprano and bass; the tenors I forget, except one, Tichatsschek, spoken of by the reporters as "the German tenor with the unpronounceable name." Staudigl afterwards appeared at Drury Lane. I met him at the Worcester Festival of 1845, where the good-humoured man declined to sing an "extra" at one of the evening concerts, even to oblige the ladies. They had asked for "Der Wanderer" of Schubert. Staudigl lost his hat at one of the "receptions" in the College Hall, held after the evening concerts. His successor, Formes, had a stentorian voice, and looked Caspar (in "Der Freischütz"), to the life. A very bad Caspar spoiled Weber's opera at Covent Garden in 1842, but I forget his name. Staudigl could sing down to low D, and always did so at a certain recitative in "The Creation," which ends with a line about the "sinuous" course of the worm! Poor Staudigl, in the sequel, lost his reason, and was confined in a Maison de Santé at Vienna, where he still sang his songs on occasion. His brain had softened.

An Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Alfred Mellon, came to grief for want of support. I remember to have heard at one of the last concerts, in November, 1865, Mrs. Meadows-White's pretty overture to "Lalla Rookh," very cordially received. Mr. Henry Leslie conducted another Amateur Orchestral Society for a few seasons about the years 1853-56, but this too proved a failure. It was a rule that either the composer of each number must be an amateur, or if not, the artist (singer or player). A musical Jew, Mr. Simon Waley, often played concertos on the pianoforte; one wet night, in Dec., 1856, I heard him execute, with M. Sainton, Beethoven's beautiful Sonata for pianoforte and violin in F. An amateur player on the hautboy, Mr. Alfred Pollock, occasionally played a piece of Handel; with whom, as well known, it was a favourite instrument. This Pollock's version of "Swallow, swallow flying south," is now quite superseded by the very superior setting of Signor Piatti. One night, in the year 1860, at a private party, Alfred Pollock met with a dire mishap. A careless lady sat down upon his hautboy, a valuable French one, and broke it. A provoking incident, but Pollock boasted that "he bore it like an angel."

"The Concerts of Antient Music" were famous for many years, and they ought never to have been allowed to drop. The title of this Society sufficiently explains the purpose of its institution. I was present at one concert during the very last season, A.D. 1846, held at the Hanover Square Rooms. A number of "notables," including the (then) Speaker of the House of Commons (afterwards Lord Eversley) were present. George Hogarth was chaffed by Mr. Gruneisen when Avison's trumpery piece, "Sound the loud timbrel," came on, for Hogarth hated it, and took good care next day to "pitch into" the work; he had just joined the Daily News (started in 1846). Mr. Parry, father of John Parry, of comic song celebrity, acted as cicerone to the press at this concert, gave them a list of the visitors, and otherwise made himself useful. Tea and coffee were provided between the parts, at the Society's expense. Poor John Parry I first heard at the Hanover Rooms in 1840; he was often engaged at benefit concerts, and too often the proprietor of the concert impudently put down his name when he was not to appear at all. His favourite songs were, "Wanted, a Governess," "Mamma is so very particular," "Berlin Wool," and others that I cannot remember. Albert Smith wrote the words, "John Parry was a superior musician; to hear him only touch the pianoforte was worth half a guinea." He suffered much from nervousness, and at one of his own "benefit" concerts in 1843 or 1844, I heard that he burst into tears, and was quite unstrung, in the artists' room, merely from "stage fright." How extraordinary this, for Parry enjoyed an unbounded popularity, and carried all the "public" away with him. Parry afterwards gave elaborate "Entertainments" à la Matthews, with imitations and feats of mimicry. I heard him at the old Assembly Rooms, Hackney, in January, 1851. Having invited him to sing at a private party at Hackney about this time (of course "on terms"), Parry most politely replied that he had given up such engagements, and therefore could not oblige me.

On that same night I engaged for the delectation of my friends, Henry Westrop and George Genge, the tenor vocalist. They sang, with my sister, Barnett's Trio in G, "This magic wove scarf," and Genge kindly introduced a song of my own composition, "The Warrior's Serenade," accompanied by Westrop. I had taken the trouble at Genge's request to transpose the (published) song from A major to C (one-third higher). Genge gave a capital reading, but told me that he should have preferred even a higher key.

Speaking of John Parry and his popularity, it may be remembered that the bulky Lablache, at the Italian Opera, frequently indulged in what are called lazzi, but I never heard one of these that was not very "poor wit," such as calling out "Good night," (Anglice) in the Serenade scene of "Don Giovanni." The silly British public laughed loudly, nevertheless. Lablache, one night (after dinner), sang for a street "ballad" squeaker, and handed him a hatful of silver, bestowed by the delighted audience.

I have yet to speak of more modern Institutions, such as the "Musical Union," and the "Monday Popular Concerts." Jam satis. A. M.

Church Bells says:—"Some indignation has been expressed, and not altogether without reason, at the omission of the Sunday evening services at Westminster Abbey during this season of the year." The same paper further complains that another "serious grievance is the non-performance by the Canons of the preaching duty, which forms almost the only return they give for their handsome stipends. At the best of times the Canons of Westminster compare far from favourably in this respect with the dignitaries of other foundations, but when Society is out of town they are more than ever conspicuous by their absence." Truly an establishment with the ample income of some £30,000 it is said, ought to do much more for the cause of religion and for the benefit of the nation than is done at Westminster Abbey. For years past, another serious charge has been made against the Abbey authorities, this has been the neglect of the week-day choral Services during the holiday season; a time, indeed, when thousands of visitors from all parts throng the great city of the world, who, in many cases are only able at that season and on week-days to attend the Services held in our great churches.

Cassell's Saturday Journal, a new serial starting next month, appears to be designed on something like parallel lines to those on which the Family Paper was founded, making due allowance for the enormous development in popular taste which has been effected during the last twenty-five years. There will be an abundance of fiction and amusement in its pages, as well as entertainment of more substantial kind; and as it will not be illustrated, all the available space will be filled to the advantage of its readers. Doubtless the enterprising publishers will duly remember the claims of Music in some way or other in their new venture.

The Church of St. Agnes and St. Anne, Gresham St. City, is now re-opened, the organ having been repaired and improved, and the piper re-voiced by Messrs. Lewis and Co.

MANCHESTER.

Mr. Carl Rosa's opera troupe are here for a fortnight. The repertory comprises, "Mignon," "Esmeralda," "Faust," "The Bohemian Girl," and "Carmen." Place for "Columba" could not be found. "Esmeralda" scored a great success, though Madame Burns (Mrs. Crotty), who played the title part, did not appear in it to so great advantage as she does in such artificial parts as Filina. Miss Annie Albu made her first appearance as Marguerite, and was distinctly successful. This is much to say when one remembers all the great artists who have appeared as the heroine of Goethe's legend. In Mr. Leumane, Mr. Rosa seems to have gained an important acquisition to the vocal strength of his company.

On Friday, the 21st, a most interesting experiment was made by a scientific gentleman interested in local telephony. By means of telephones placed on the stage of the theatre and the usual conducting wires he conveyed the opera to his residence some two miles distant, and not only the music, but the dialogue as well as the applause of the audience could be perfectly heard. The only difficulty was with the orchestral bass, which could not be easily distinguished. Does the telephone reduce the limits of audibility in the human ear? Mr. Rosa was present, and able to criticise his artists easily, thus upsetting the time-honoured saw about the absence of the cat.

THE IMPERIAL THEATRE.

Mr. J. W. Currans, acting manager at this theatre, took his benefit last Saturday, when special attractions were announced in the shape of three new pieces, the authors having consented to appear in their respective plays. The farce, "Blonde and Brunette," by Mr. John Augustus O'Shea, was, however, withdrawn, and it is almost a subject of regret that the same policy was not pursued with the remaining pieces. "Auld Robin Gray," a one-act drama, adapted by Mr. George Roy from Jean Marie, proved dull and uninteresting, nor was it redeemed by some very indifferent acting; while Mr. H. P. Grattan's three-act comedy, "Ye Legende: or, The Four Phantoms," chiefly caused amusement by the absurdity of its construction, and the many slips and unintentional comicalities by which it was accompanied. A poorer performance has seldom been in London, though it must be admitted that the comedy had not a fair hearing owing to its unfinished mode of presentation, the actors generally being defective in their parts, and the prompter's services in constant requisition. Mr. John Hudspeth formed a bright exception to the general mediocrity, his really excellent and humorous acting of John Thomas, the butler, gaining almost the only genuine applause of the evening. The theatre was so scantily attended that it is to be feared Mr. Currans would not realise much from his benefit. On another occasion of the kind he would do well to provide some more solid attraction.

F. E. T.

Mr. Willing's Choir will be well to the front during the coming season. The concert scheme includes, Sir George Macfarren's oratorio "King David," for the first time in London, on Dec. 11th, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," and a miscellaneous selection on Jan. 15th, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on March 25th, and a new cantata, "Perizabeh," by Mr. Wilfred Bendall, on April 22nd.

In the course of the New York Tribune's criticism of Mr. S. G. Pratt's opera of "Zenobia" the writer observes "As for the invention, his score contains several numbers which the most captious critic must admire—the opening chorus of priests, and the contrast of the pedlars' chorus following; Zenobia's air at the begining of the second act, and the exquisite slumber-song which precedes it; the finale of that act; the quartet of the third act; Zenobia's song in the fourth act, with the pathetic return of the slumber-song as accompaniment; the fine 'Ode to Immortality,' and its treatment; and the finale of the opera, all require sincere commendation." Perhaps Mr. Carl Rosa has already thought of this work; if not, his attention, or the like forethought of some other English opera manager, would be at once a courageous recognition of merit and a graceful compliment to our cousins across the Atlantic.

BOSTON, LINCOLNSHIRE.

Elsewhere appears the specification of a new organ recently erected at the Boston Chapel of Ease, one of the ugliest specimens of "little Bethel" architecture that could be imagined by any architect in a fit of dyspepsia. The organist, Mr. T. H. Scott, last week, displayed the qualities of this instrument, the manufacture of Mr. T. H. Nicholson, in presence of the writer. Mr. Scott played the Offertorium of Lefébure-Wely in G, and another of Edward Batiste in D, besides other pieces of minor pretension, with all the skill and technique of an experienced musician. The effect of the "mixtures" was exquisite. The "Röhr Flote" and the "Flute" are deliciously smooth and dulcet; the "Oboe" (Swell organ) struck the writer as slightly nasal in tone, but the "orchestral Oboe" has put this old stop quite out of joint. Mr. Nicholson is to be complimented on his production.

Mr. Scott also favoured the writer with a "discourse" on one of the harmoniums, to be viewed at the handsome rooms of Messrs. Hildred Brothers, Market Place, Boston. Here, indeed, is a harmonium worthy to redeem the ordinary "cheap-Jacks" of country Churches, condemned last week. The instrument is greatly superior to the so-called American and other "organs" that are really of the same species, and not organs at all. There are twenty stops, and two manuals. Mr. Scott afterwards played in the same rooms, on a 7-octave "upright iron-overwrought pianoforte" (manufactured in Germany), which sufficiently exemplified the competency of the craft to produce the finest "action." Mr. Scott, in a Lied ohne Wörte of Mendelssohn (the one in A major from Book V) gave practical proof of the touch and tone. Mr. Scott's own German grand "iron-overstrung horizontal" pianoforte is a powerful "concert-orchestral" instrument, worthy so to be called, at the same time that the soul of expression may be evolved by velvety hands and judicious pedalling.

CORK.

An interesting feature in the musical portion of the Cork Industrial Exhibition was a band contest held on the 21st and 22nd inst. in the great hall.

On the first day, which was set apart for the military, seven bands entered for the contest. Each band was required to perform the overture to "Oberon," and, in addition, a piece of their own selection, the prizes being £20, £10, and £5 respectively for the first, second, and third best bands. Messrs. J. Smith, Mus. Doc. T.C.D.; J. P. Smith, bandmaster Scots Guards; J. C. Van Maanen, bandmaster Royal Irish Constabulary, acted as judges. Having ballotted for places, the playing commenced at one o'clock and continued until six. On the conclusion of the contest, Mr. J. P. Clarke delivered judgment as follows:—"Ladies and Gentlemen,—The judges are unanimous in awarding the first prize to the third band in the order in which they played, namely, the 2nd Batt. Oxfordshire Light Infantry. The second prize we are equally unanimous in adjudging to the band which played fifth in order, and that we find to be the band of the 20th Hussars. We also desire specially to commend the band which played fourth in order, the 1st Batt. Lincolnshire Regiment, and, on our representation, the Exhibition Committee have consented to give them the third prize. We desire to compliment all the bandmasters on their various performances." Besides the money prizes mentioned above, each of the successful bandmasters was presented with a medal.

On the second day, for Civilian Reed Bands, there were only four entries, two local and two from Dublin. The first prize was awarded to the Barrack Street Band, the same band which was victorious at the Dublin Exhibition band contest; the second was divided between the two Dublin bands. These bands were required to play a selection from Rossini's "Mosé in Egitto," and a piece of their own choice.

F. ST. JOHN LACY.

The excellent performance recently at the Promenade Concerts of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, recalls to old concert-goers the admirable rendering of this delicious music at the Covent Garden Concerts under Alfred Mellon, some 15 years ago, with a band containing such artists as Pratten, Barrett, Nicholson, Lazarus, Winterbottom, and the Harpers.

Mr. Villiers Stanford will, it is understood, compose a Cantata for the next Festival at Birmingham.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent).

Sept. 26th.

The Liverpool Philharmonic Society begin the 1883-4 season on Tuesday, October 9th, when Mr. Charles Hallé will make his first appearance in the capacity of conductor to the society. During the first half of the season, the sixth concert taking place on the 18th December, the following symphonies are to be performed:—Mozart's No. 6, in C major; Haydn's "Oxford" in G; Mendelssohn's "Scotch," and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding;" while among the overtures announced are Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3; Mendelssohn's "Hebrides," Auber's "Zanetta," Spohr's "Jessonda," Schubert's "Italian," Eade's "Hamlet," Cherubini's "Lodoiska," Gounod's "Mirella," and Sterndale Bennett's "Naiades." An orchestral and choral selection from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" also figures in the scheme, and other composers mentioned as contributing to the programme are Gluck, Wagner, Ernst, Wieniawski, Hummel, Molique, Svensden, Eliaka, Hillar, and Saint-Saëns—names which suggest varying degrees of merit. Mr. Hallé will be prominent in the pianoforte music of the season, and Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. L. Straus not less conspicuous—the one in Spohr's Ninth (D minor), and the other in Molique's Fifth Violin Concerto (A minor). The "Messiah" is to be performed on December 18th, when the newly-formed chorus of the society will appear for the first time.

It will be no news to the readers of the Musical Standard to inform them that English music is notoriously absent in the above scheme, if they have watched the scheme of the Manchester concerts under the direction of the same conductor. It is an admitted fact amongst Manchester musicians, that whatever Mr. Hallé has done for musical art in general, he has never given a helping hand to the musical works of Englishmen. At Mr. Hallé's own orchestral concerts, which alternate with the Philharmonic Concerts, Beethoven's nine symphonies are to be played in chronological order, and form a strong contrast to the meagre scheme of symphonies set down for performance at the Liverpool Philharmonic Society's concerts.

Mr. Joseph Maas sang at a concert given in the Philharmonic Hall, on Saturday evening last, and created a furore, being recalled four times.

GLASGOW.

The Glasgow Select Choir gave a concert on Sept. 22nd, under the auspices of the Abstainers' Union, in St. Andrew's Hall, which forms the first of a series organised by that body to take place on Saturdays. The programme consisted of part-songs, glees and solos, by Cowen, Smart, Weber, Bishop, Blumenthal, Fasing, Booth, Behrend, Callcott, Hume, Mendelssohn and Spofforth. Dr. Peace contributed several pieces on the organ, in his usual faultless manner, and Mr. W. D. Swan acted as accompanist. There is a marked improvement in this latter gentleman's style of performance, and study will soon place him in the foremost rank of West of Scotland pianists. The solos were all of a most satisfactory character, the contralto being especially happy. Mr. James Allan, as usual, conducted.

Mr. David Baptie, of this city, has published with Messrs. W. Morley & Co., of London, a "Handbook of Musical Biography," in which will be found a large amount of useful information in a condensed and easily accessible form. Few names of importance are wanting, and though no pretence is made of giving a full account of each musician noticed, the book will serve as a very handy name-list, in which the chronology is sufficiently accurate for all ordinary purposes. The work can be recommended for the eclectic spirit which it shows, and for the notice bestowed on contemporary musicians.

CHICAGO.

The average attendance at Theodore Thomas's Orchestral Concerts at Chicago recently, has been from 3000 to 5000. Among the works, all of which were admirably rendered, were the following symphonies: the Sixth and Seventh of Beethoven; the No. 2, in C major, of Schumann; the "Leonore" of Raff; the "Unfinished" and the great Symphony in C ("Jupiter") of Mozart; and the following, which were heard for the first time in Chicago: Symphony in F, No. 9, by Goetz; Symphony in D minor, No. 1, by Volkmann, and Symphony in D, by Dvorak, the Slavic composer. Overture, "Mein Heim," by Dvorak; the "Manfred" music, by Schumann; the "Intermezzo Scherzando," by Reinhold; "Scenes Alsaciennes," by Massenet; the "Good Friday's Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal"; "Bal Costume," a most charming masquerade of national dances, by Rubinstein, originally written as a four-hand piece for piano; a gavotte, by Sgambeti; a setting by Mr. Thomas for full string orchestra of the minuet and finale from Beethoven's string quartet, No. 9, in C; Liszt's brilliant Tarantelle, adapted for orchestra by Berghaus Muller, who also adapted the Second Rhapsody; a concert overture, "The Princess," by Mr. Whiting, the organist; overture to "Macbeth," by Kelley, a young musician in San Francisco, who recently studied music with Mr. Eddy, in this city; an "Alla Mazurka," by Gernsheim; a prelude from the manuscript opera of "Montezuma," by Mr. Frederick Grant Gleason, "Em Marchen," a violin obbligato by Templeton Strong, and a serenade by Robert Fuchs.

TAUNTON.—The annual harvest thanksgiving services in connection with St. James's Church, Taunton, were held on Sunday last. The services throughout the day were full choral, and were sustained by a strong choir, Mr. T. J. Dudeney presiding at the organ. The following was the order of musical services:—Morning: Anthem, "O Lord, how manifold," J. Barnby; Kyrie, T. J. Dudeney; Credo, J. Merbecke. Evening: Anthem, "We give Thee thanks," G. A. Macfarren. The organist, Mr. Dudeney, selected voluntaries of a festive character for the day. In the morning he played in fine style, as an opening voluntary, the chorus, "Lift up your heads," from the "Messiah"; and as a concluding voluntary the "Hallelujah Chorus," from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," otherwise known as "Engedi." At the evening service he opened with the chorus, "Thanks be to God," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and concluded with Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." During the subsequent recital he played his Andante con Variazioni e Fuga, a composition which has won the highest encomiums from some of the first musicians of the day. The church in the evening was crowded to such an extent that forms had to be placed in the aisles, and many persons were content to stand up during the whole of the service. The singing, which has vastly improved in this parish recently, was of an exceptionally high order.

Reviews.

Compendium of Thorough Bass and Patent Chord Denoter. By F. W. von Kornatski. (Weekes & Co., Hanover Street).—Anything more ingenious in the way of practically teaching harmony has never yet been invented. The Compendium and Chord Denoter is not a book. Outwardly it is a case in book form. The contents consist of a guide connecting the principles of harmony with the author's scheme, and the mechanism planned for its expression. A framework with the two musical staves painted on glass and arranged so as to admit the insertion of the cards underneath forms a leading feature of the invention. The printed cards are covered by details connected with scale formations, chords, sequences, &c., all duly classified and arranged with astonishing skill and forethought so as to present—when placed under the glass and moved from note to note as may be desired—all the possible positions and ramifications connected with the scale or chord to be illustrated. To young students the "Chord Denoter" will be found to be simply invaluable, especially as conveying to the inexperienced mind such logically arranged information as awakens and strengthens the student's faculties and creates such an insight into the wondrous subtle beauty of the harmonic system and its heaven-born proportions, as cannot fail to enlarge the mind and impress the imagination. All teachers should forthwith make the acquaintance of this thoughtful and valuable invention.

To the Immortals. Song. Words by D. F. Blomfield, Music by R. F. Ellicott. (Enoch & Sons, Holles Street, 1883.)—This is a pianoforte edition of a song produced at the late Gloucester Festival, with full orchestral accompaniment (noticed under the head of "Passing Events" in last week's issue). The stanzas are supposed to be the prayer of a lover to "the gods" to the effect that when his fair one "wakes from dreams in the silent night, she may think awhile on him," and that when the deities are pleased to remove the lady "from this dull earth into their land of mirth," they will take him as well! The first part of Miss Ellicott's composition is in the quiet sostenuto preghiera style; but at the invocation of the Gods, the tone becomes more passionate, and some effective modulations colour the text. Thus, at the words, "Grant, O ye Gods," a pause on the chord of C major (the dominant of the dominant), leads to a passage in F minor and A flat. The "working up" displays much skill and savoir faire, but Miss Ellicott is known to be an accomplished musician and elegant song-writer. Key B flat, range from low C to E flat or F (Optional). Miss Ellicott uses the chord of the 6—4—3, so strongly objected to by pig-tail contrapuntists, with a suspension of the root in the treble clef.

NOTTINGHAM.

The Albert Hall was crowded on September 24th by a delighted audience, and it is questionable whether during the concert season of 1883—84 a couple of hours will be spent more pleasantly by lovers of music than the time was passed by those who were fortunate enough to secure seats on this occasion. The new organ could hardly have been opened under more favourable circumstances. The reputation of Mr. W. T. Best as a brilliant and accomplished organist is so well known that it is needless almost to speak in his praise. It goes without saying that he showed to perfection the power and charming tunefulness of the new organ, and that no one could have been chosen more fitted to perform the task. The greatest skill, experience, and ability have been exercised in the construction of the new organ, and the result is an instrument which is perfect. It is built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield.

The programme of the music given by Mr. Best was as follows :—

Organ Sonata, No. 2, in C minor	Mendelssohn.
Andante in A major	Smart.
Turkish March, "Ruins of Athens"	Beethoven.
Siciliana and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Andante, with variations and finale	Best.
Fugue in G major	Wesley.
Bell Rondo	Morandi.
Overture (founded on the "Austrian Hymn")	Haslinger.

The "Turkish March" enraptured the audience. It permits a gradual increase of the organ tone to be made from the opening pianissimo, leading by degrees to the full power of the instrument, after which the tone is gradually diminished to the end of the march. The brilliant style in which Mr. Best played this famous march was a treat to listen to; the audience showed their appreciation of his performance by loud and continued applause, signifying that they wished to hear it again, and Mr. Best kindly acceded to their wishes. His wonderfully clever rendering of the "Bell Rondo" showed again to great advantage the powers of the organ, and he was loudly applauded. These two selections afforded the greatest pleasure to the audience, but the whole programme was listened to with feelings which high-class music alone can excite, and, on the whole, a more admirable entertainment of the kind could hardly be expected. During an interval in the performance it was announced that another eminent organist will shortly preside at the organ, and when the time, which will be duly advertised, arrives, we have no doubt that the Albert Hall will be again filled by a similarly appreciative audience to that which so heartily welcomed Mr. W. T. Best.

The Nottingham Daily Express, from which the above account is extracted, also gives a complete scheme of the fine organ the town now boasts the possession of, and which has already appeared in these columns. The presence of such an instrument in a fine room will doubtless tend to increase the local love of organ music.

LIVERPOOL.

An organ recital was given in St. George's Hall, by Mr. W. T. Best, on Thursday, September 10th. The following was the programme :—

Organ Concerto in G major	Handel.
Largo—Ciaconna—Andante—Fuga.
Andante in A major	Smart.
Prelude and Fugue in C minor, No. 6	Bach.
Legende :—"La Prédication aux Oiseaux" ("St. Francis of Assisi preaches to the birds")	Liszt.
Overture, "La part du Diable"	Auber.

And on Saturday, September 22nd :—

Organ Sonata, No 3, in A major	Mendelssohn.
Con moto maestoso—Andante tranquillo.
Introduction and Pastoral Chorus, "Le Prophète" } Hymn sung in the Cathedral }	Meyerbeer.
Air, Variations, and Finale Fugato	Smart.
Adagio in E major	Merkel.
Introduction and Allegro Marziale	Bache.

The new organ at St. Martin's Church, Birmingham, has been rebuilt by Mr. J. C. Banfield with admirable skill and judgment. The instrument has now three Manuals and Pedal organ, and some 40 stops.

FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

The following organ recitals have been given during the week by Mr. J. Loaring, F.C.O. The programmes included :—

Overture, "Griselda"	Paer.
Organ Concerto, No. 7	Handel.
Gipsy Rondo	Haydn.
Offertoire in G	Wely.
Organ Concerto, No. 1	Handel.
Rondo con Imitazione de Campanielli	Morandi.
Chorus and Fuga, from Grand Mass in D	Righini.
"Bridal March"	Edwards.
Organ Concerto, No. 2	Handel.
"Cujus Animam"	Rossini.

An organ recital was given on Friday, September 21st by Mr. Freeman Dovaston, A.C.O. The programme comprised :—

Marche d'Eglise	Saville.
Organ Voluntary	Heron.
Offertoire in A	Batiste.
Allegro, from P.F. duet	Mozart.
Introduction and Allegro	Wood.
Postlude in C	Batiste.

Also by Master Henry J. Wood :—

"The Old Abbey March"	Wagner.
Cathedral Melody	Moir.
Offertoire in G	Lott.
Andante, No. 1	Batiste.
March of the Crusaders	Sibley.

And by Mr. Churchill Sibley :—

"Cathedral March	Sibley.
Trumpet March	Jude.
Cathedral March	Sibley.

And by Mr. H. C. Tonking, R.A.M. :—

Overture, "Occasional Oratorio"	Handel.
Offertoire in G	Wely.
Postlude in D	Smart.
Postlude in C minor	Steggall.
Fantasia on a Welsh March	Best.

Organ recitals were given on Tuesday, September 25th, by Mr F. Dovaston, A.C.O. The programmes included :—

March in B flat	Silas.
Offertoire in F	Wely.
Organ Voluntary	Burrowes.
Allegretto	Gladstone.
Festive March	Smart.
Allegro vivace	Mozart.
Postlude in E flat	Wely.
Andante and Allegro	Bache.
March in C	Grunnen.
"Danse Royal"	Watson.
Offertoire in C	Wely.
Andante con moto	Smart.
Chorus, "But the waters" ("Moses and the children")	Handel.
Minuet and Trio	Hoyte.
"Austria," with variations	Haydn.
"Song of Peace"	Roeckel.
"March of the old Brigade"	Barri.

And on Wednesday, September 26th :—

Allegro Pomposo	Smart.
Minuet and Trio	Hoyte.
Andante in D	Silas.
Prelude and Fugue in C	Bach.
Allegro Moderato, from 1st Sonata	Mendelssohn.
Song for Tenor	Smart.
Introduction and Allegro	Wood.

BERKELEY SQUARE, W.

The new organ, built by Bryceson Bros., for St. Mary's Church, has two pitch-pine cases, each 22ft. high, 7ft. 6in. wide, 9 ft. deep, and 9ft. apart, to show west window. The Manuals, Great organ, Pedal open, and 'cello are on north side; Swell organ, sub-bass, and bass flute on south side of gallery. The swell organ, CC to G, has eight stops; the great organ has also eight stops; the pedal organ, CCC to F, has four stops, and there are four couplers, &c.:—Swell to great, swell to pedals, great to pedals, bellows signal.

PRESTON.

Mr. James Tomlinson (organist to the Corporation), resumed his Saturday evening recitals, in the New Public Hall, on Saturday, September 22nd. The following was the programme :—

Marche Religieuse	Adam.
Andante (Violin Concerto)	Mendelssohn.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor	Bach.
Overture to "Mirella"	Gounod.
Communion	Grison.
Hungarian March	Berlioz.

The tasteful manner in which Mr. Tomlinson rendered "Communion" (Grison), elicited a well-deserved encore. There were a very large number of persons present.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Thanks to the spirited and enlightened action of the Committee of the Institute, the first organ recital given here after the holidays has come to be regarded as a sort of opening day of the musical season, as affording the earliest sign of earnest, active, musical life. On Saturday last, Mr. Walter Parratt, of Windsor, a most finished performer, and an accomplished musician, gave the recital. His programme was worthy of his artistic reputation. It opened with Mozart's Introduction and Fugue in D, originally written for orchestra. Next was a movement by Lemmens. The great feature of the recital, however, was a fine performance of a new organ Sonata in E minor by Rheinberger, a work of high purpose and skilful writing. Mr. Parratt says of it in his notes: "It is in four numbers—1. A solemn Adagio with Fugue, which is three times interrupted by a second theme not treated fugally; 2. A graceful Intermezzo; 3. A Scherzo entirely devoted to the development of one theme, and leading to 4, a Passacaglia, a series of clever variations upon a ground bass, the Sonata being rounded off by a repetition with slight variations of the Introduction." Other organ solos were "Grand Chœur Dialogue" by Eugène Gigout, a good specimen of the French school, and Bach's wonderfully wrought out "Toccata and Fugue in C major." All these works received ample justice from the head and hands of the organist, whose playing gave very great pleasure to his audience. Miss Florence Norman sang nicely and was once recalled. Mr. Fountain Meen was the excellent accompanist. To-night Mr. W. S. Hoyte will play. On Monday, Mr. R. Ganthony gives a reading and musical entertainment.

TEWKESBURY.

In connection with the Commemoration Services celebrating the anniversary of the re-opening of the Abbey Church, a grand Festival of Parochial Choirs was held on Tuesday, September 25th. Above 400 choristers assembled, and testified to the judicious care with which they had been prepared by their choirmaster, Mr. Hemingway, F.C.O., who conducted the festival, with the exception of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, which, being written for the occasion, was conducted by the composer, Dr. C. J. Frost. This, a work containing effective yet not difficult work for the voices, and an independent organ accompaniment, together with parts for cornets, horns, trombones, bass and drums, produced an admirable effect, and is unquestionably a welcome addition to the small list of practicable easy Services. In the evening an organ recital was given by Dr. Frost, who played in admirable style the following pieces:—

March in D Fantasia in F	Best.
Sonata in C Introduction—Allegro—Andante—Finale.	Volckmar.
Andante in G, and Larghetto in F	Frost.
Hommage à Handel	Moscheles.
Cantata, "God, Thou art great"	Spohr.
Allegro vivace ("Reformation Symphony")	Mendelssohn.
Andante Grazioso in E, and Moderato con moto in A minor	Smart.
Allegro vivace in A minor	Morandi.
Chorus, "Hallelujah" ("Messiah")	Handel.

On Thursday, September 27th, a harvest thanksgiving service was held at 7.30 p.m.; and on Sunday, September 30th, at 6.30, Evensong, the Festival Service will be repeated, with band and organ. Anthem, "The Wilderness" (Wesley).

OLDHAM.

An organ recital was given by Mr. Wm. Mullineux, F.C.O., on Friday, September 21st, at the Industrial Exhibition. The programme included:—

March for the organ in D major	Best.
Prelude and Fugue in D major	Bach.
Scherzo Symphonique Concertant	Lemmens.
Organ Sonata in B flat, No. 4	Mendelssohn.
Introduction, Variations and Fuga on the Hymn-tune "Jerusalem the golden"	Dearnaley.
"Adoremus," Melodie Religieuse	Ravina.
"Improvisation"
Grand Fantasia and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Grand Chœur in D	Guilmant.

And by Mr. Fred Turner:—

Sonata No. 4, in B flat	Mendelssohn.
Barcarolle from 4th Concerto	Bennett.
Andante in G	Smart.
Toccata and Fugue in C major	Bach.
Andante in A	Hopkins.
Fanfare in D major	Lemmens.
Grand Chœur in D major	Guilmant.

BRADFORD.

An organ recital was given on the rich new organ at St. Mary's Church, by Mr. James H. Rooks, of St. Paul's, Manningham, Bradford, in the presence of a large and fashionable audience. The programme had evidently been chosen with great care and taste, for it was of such a kind as enabled the organist to bring out the full, rich, and varied tones of the fine instrument to perfection. Sir R. Stewart's "Pastorale," Mozart's overture, C major, Smart's "Fantasia," with chorale, and the "Storm Fantasia," were all performed with remarkable brilliancy. The programme finished with Handel's "Hallelujah."

The annual choir services at St. Thomas's Church, were celebrated on Sunday in the presence of large congregations. In the evening, when the sacred edifice was crowded from end to end, the choir was strengthened by about fifty members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung after the sermon. A temporary platform had been erected in the chancel for the accommodation of the singers. The soloists were Miss Clara Marshall, soprano; Mrs. Clarke, contralto; and Mr. Wm. Coates, tenor. Mr. J. H. Rooks presided at the organ, and Mr. W. H. Emsley, choirmaster of St. Thomas's, conducted. At the morning service, which was also fully choral, Goss's anthem, "The Wilderness," was given by the church choir.

HIGHER BLACKLEY.

An organ recital was recently given by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., in the Methodist New Connection, Zion Chapel. The programme included:—

Organ Sonata, in F minor	Mendelssohn.
Pastorale in A major Canzone in A minor	Guilmant.
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Grand Fantasia in E minor	Lemmens.
March for the organ, in D major	Best.

ABERFELDY.

The following is the programme of an organ recital given by Mr. Jesse Timson, in the Episcopal Church, of St. David's, Weem, on the 21st ult.:—

Organ Concerto in B Flat, No. 6 Allegro—Larghetto—Allegro Moderato.	Handel.
Roco Adagio	Smart.
Triumphal March from "Naaman"	Costa.
Andante in F	Gritton.
Fugue in D minor	Bach.
Postlude in C	Smart.
Andante, from 11th Symphon y	Mozart.
Festal March	Calkin.

PERTH.

On Saturday, September 15th, Mr. Woodthorpe Browne resumed the series of monthly organ recitals, in the Parish Church, Kinnoult. The programme included the following:

Overture in E minor	Morandi.
Air in E flat	Mozart.
Adagio Cantabile	Haydn.
Organ Sonata	Mendelssohn.
Andante in A minor and major, and in B flat	Batiste.
Grand Schiller March	Meyerbeer.

ECCLESHALL.

The organ of Eccleshall Church, after being silent for nearly two months, undergoing thorough reparation and improvement, was re-opened recently by Mr. J. E. Jefferies, organist of St. Matthew's Parish Church, Walsall, who gave two recitals to large congregations. The programmes included:—Afternoon: Overture to "Samson" (Handel); Sonata in C minor, No. 2 (Mendelssohn); Toccata et Fugue in D minor (Bach); Andante from Sonata in E minor Op. 70 (Weber). Evening: Overture to the "Occasional Oratorio" (Handel); Prelude and Fugue in D (Bach); Larghetto from Symphony in D (Beethoven); Offertoire in D (Batiste); "Schiller March" (Meyerbeer). In all the pieces Mr. Jefferies proved himself to be a thorough executant, receiving afterwards hearty congratulations for his masterly performance. W. Addenbrooke, Esq., sang the two solos with great taste and finish, adding much to the pleasure of the recitals.

The death of Mr. C. S. Packer, for many years organist of St. Mary's, Reading, is announced with regret.

The new organ for the Royal Naval Hospital Chapel at Plymouth is being built by Messrs. Hele and Co., to whom the order was given by the Admiralty authorities.

PIANOFORTE PEDALS.

MR. JOSEPH HATTON describes Miss TIPPETS in his little society story, "Kites and Pigeons" as seated at the pianoforte "with her foot on the soft "pedal playing a new set of waltzes "pianissimo, that no one may be disturbed by the music, and also, that "her mistakes may be less noticeable than they "would be under the influence of the forte pedal." But musicians well know that the abuse of the so-called forte pedal commonly arises from an instinctive feeling on the part of badly trained pianists that the damper pedal affords the readiest means of sheltering all sorts of defects of playing technicalities; although the popular novelist is right so far as he pictures the would-be fashionable young lady as putting down the soft pedal when she desires to feel her way with dreamy, cat-like softness of touch through a new piece; this abuse of one of the pianoforte pedals is, indeed, not unusual, and it is here shrewdly hit off. The use of and abuse of the pianoforte pedals would indeed furnish food for an essay on the helplessness and perversity of the human mind under the influence of badly formed habits, or the half-unconscious consciousness of the advisability of employing any means we may have within reach, whereby we may nervously shelter ourselves from the unpleasant risk of bringing down public judgment upon our own defective talents or acquirements. The pedals of the pianoforte—beyond of course an allowed conscientious desire to employ them effectively—are to the inefficient or imperfectly trained pianist just what the walking-stick and umbrella are to nervous awkward people who do not know what to do with their hands when walking out. And the comparison may be pushed further, for in both cases the existing awkwardness is not really hidden from observant listeners or spectators, by either the uncalled for employment of the damper pedal, or the awkward handling of walking-stick or umbrella. Seriously, the modern abuse of the pianoforte pedals is a matter calling for the earnest attention of both teachers and pupils, and this same abuse is so prevalent that only our most accomplished players can be said to use the damper pedal judiciously. And this judicious employment of the pedal being almost impossible of attainment without the previous formation of a perfect finger mechanism, the pianoforte teacher's duty is either to watch most carefully the formation of the habit of properly using the pedals, or to forbid their employment entirely until the student is prepared by a mastery of the finger mechanisms to be better able to bestow the necessary attention upon the artistic use of the pedals and is fully able to control the desire to put down the damper pedal as a ready means of producing stronger tones and sheltering imperfect fingering. The best way, as everybody agrees, of curing an evil is to first discover its origin. In the present matter, want of command over nerves and mechanisms is the root of the evil. The consequent defects are involved in the too hurried formation of the player's style, in the general eagerness for results, which pervades the artistic just as it does the commercial world. Instead of striving to attain a perfectly true, strong action of the fingers, we are too anxious to cultivate music which displays a more cheaply bought power, springing from the already strong wrists and arms; a misled taste modern writers pander to, as saleable new music usually means that which produces an apparent maximum of result from a minimum of labour. The fingers indeed should be trained to express every possible light and shade, from fortissimo to pianissimo, as a matter all important to the earnest executant. BEETHOVEN and other classical composers for key-board instruments ask in their works for this necessary power, which is a much higher qualification than the deceptive power we meet with in the banging of big heavy chords from the wrist and arm. Composers naturally borrow orchestral as the highest of instrumental idioms in writing for the pianoforte. Now, a rapid passage in single notes assigned to a mass of violins looks to be a slender matter on paper, but when springing from a number of equally handled bows, whether the notes are taken delicately or forcibly, such a sentence presents a striking effect to listen to. So the fingers of the pianist should be strong and true enough to bring forward such passages relying solely upon finger power, as may be found, to give only one instance, in the first movement of BEETHOVEN'S Sonata in G, Op. 49, No. 2. The thoroughly trained artist is never unwilling to play such music, but the sham cheap-jack performer would shrink from such a piece and would select something of the prevailing written-to-show-off-without-much-preparation school of music. Then one cause of the abuse of the damper pedal arises from the natural feeling for rhythmical distribution being generally more developed than is the judgment and knowledge of the progress of chord roots and the division of their several harmonic strata. How to effectually conquer habits so strong as to frequently defy the utmost determination and defeat the greatest care of their unfortunate student victim, is a matter which must often seriously engage the attention of the conscientious teacher. Without going into details, I will venture upon a few suggestions with regard to the conquering of the acquired habit of misusing the pianoforte pedals. At first the teacher or the earnest student anxious to correct himself, should entirely forbid or forego the use of either pedal, by having both taken off the pianoforte. Then a course of thorough finger training should be inaugurated, which to be complete should include the study of the organ or harmonium, in order to secure a perfect nervous, strong, legato touch. Next, the practice of BACH'S "Preludes and Fugues," and even vocal fugues with a careful sustenation of the parts, should be undertaken. Then HAYDN and MOZART'S Sonatas, and other music thinly laid out for pure finger work, should be practised without the pedals. So much for the task of eradicating a bad habit; now for the building up of a good one in connection with the use of the pedals of the pianoforte. A few exercises should be compiled with marks for the damper pedal to be put down to chords on accented, then on uncented beats, to be alternated with exercises for the same pedal to be put down during rests between chords. Next, a few passages with the occasional employment of the pedals should be rehearsed; and, lastly, sentences from CHOPIN, LISZT, and other modern composers should be given for study, involving the dexterous and frequent use of the damper pedal and the occasional employment of the soft pedal in con sordini passages. Even after much painstaking drill, great care will have to be exercised, lest a relapse into old and not easily conquered habits sets in. The difficulty chiefly concerns the use of the damper pedal, but the student should be trained to use both pedals at exactly the right times, and their employment should be absolutely confined to the passages which are specially marked for their use. The questions connected with the mental and mechanical operations of the instrumental performer are many, and are important in their bearing upon the artist's success as well as interesting in their consideration. I hope presently to venture to offer further thoughts in this direction.

Digitized by Google

"NOSE" MUSIC IN CHURCH.

The musical world is indebted to Mr. T. L. Southgate, an able and learned contributor to this journal, for the term "nose" music, derisively applied to a certain absurd fashion imposed upon vocalists by M. Gounod. Apart from the practice of singing, or trying to sing, with closed lips, we all know what is meant by "singing through the nose"! For the present, I propose to speak solely of "nose" music in the instrumental sense.

Last week, a few remarks were made respecting "tin-kettle pianofortes" in the country, and pianofortes out of condition, that is to say, out of tune, hic et ubique. But worse remains behind. At home, in the rural rectory, or the dull country house, "a "little music," of nights, may, if officiously proposed, be sternly interdicted by Paterfamilias as a bore. On the first day of the week, however, ignorantly miscalled, by Judaizing Christians, the "Sabbath," Papa is impotent, and his "interdict" as invalid as the Pope's in Protestant and enlightened lands. The Church bells begin to chime for morning service, and gloomy thoughts, of a sceptical kind, at once intrude themselves upon the mind as it reflects on its "possi-"bilities," or *im*possibilities, of the musical portion of Divine Service, at the sanctuary in Sloshy-cum-Starvation, or Wilderness-on-the-Wolds.

The Ritualists and other Reformers of the Services (I speak of forms, not doctrines)—have put a stop to many anomalies, such as reading of the Psalms and Canticles; the duet between the literate clergyman with his accurate pronunciation and the ignorant clerk with his hopeless provincialisms. The school children are generally drilled at a choir's practice on the Friday, and there may be a tolerable player on the organ, in the person of the schoolmaster or the clergyman's wife. But then the instrument itself! What of that?

Heaven save us from the ordinary harmonium! No musical ear could even be taught to tolerate the nasal tone of this most offensive wind instrument. True, that fine harmoniums, of sonorous quality, enriched with numerous and effective stops, may be purchased in Paris for fifty guineas and upwards, and I heard a very fine one at Boston (of foreign manufacture) ten days ago. I now refer to the "cheap "Jacks" which the indigence, or niggardly spirit, of rural parishes provides for Church worship. Better to have voices *un*accompanied than these pseudo-sirens. The harmonium is only one of a very disagreeable family. I may be wrong, but all these peculiar wind instruments, where the sound is derived from the action of the wind upon metallic tongues or plates, made me feel like Mozart, at the sound of the trumpet, when blown a few commas on "the "wrong side of the post." In the words of my friend Mr. Southgate, the harmonium is nose music; the effect intensely disagreeable, and provocative of irritable temper rather than fervent devotion. Hector Berlioz, in his valuable book on the orchestra, speaks of other obnoxious instruments of the "species"; I include within my own ban, the seraphine, the apollonicon, the concertina—in fact all machines where the sound is produced in the manner specified.

Suppose that an organ is found in the village Church. Well, or ill: there are organs and organs, good, bad, and indifferent. At present, I am doomed to hear a small organ, of fairly suave and agreeable tone, but with only one manual, and four stops! This, too, in a comparatively large Church. The choir of school children, supported by this limited accompaniment, chant the Canticles and Psalms, and intone the Responses. In other places, I have heard horrible organs, not only weak, but out of tune, and in the last grumpy stage of decay! The execution of the player too, often aggravates the nuisance. The parsons' wives and squires' ladies may, or may not, know something about "music." When they don't, heaven help you; when they do, "a little know-"ledge" leadeth to presumption and bad practice. I remember a shallow pated self-conceited lady of the manor, in the wilds of Northamptonshire, who used to write "chaunt" for "chant," and at the end of the final or playing out "Voluntary, on the Sunday, lifted her hands suddenly from the keys as soon as she saw the last "silly sheep" out at the door. The effect of this staccato, on the organ, may be imagined. Speaking of grammatical, in addition to musical, ignorance, I may mention that one clergyman's wife, in Bucks, used to hand me the list of hymns, on the Sunday, with such solecisms as "the four first verses of Hymn, No. LVI.," &c.—Dean Alford boldly defended this monstrous contradiction in terms, but in Mr. Moon, who wrote a book called "The Dean's English," the unfortunate master of Canterbury Cathedral caught a veritable Tartar! There cannot be four first, or even fifty first verses! Or is it—to answer fools according to their folly—a case of primus inter pares?

By the way of a solatium, I am going to hear Mr. Scott, one of the organists at Boston, who will kindly show off his instrument, and play select pieces (at my request), by Lefébure-Wely (the Offertorium in G major) and Batiste's Offertorium, No. 5. The organ in the immense mother church of Boston, quite a cathedral, shall be duly discussed; Mr. Scott's own organ is a new one, erected in the Chapel of Ease. Mr. Scott also proposes to play on his new German "iron-overstrung" grand pianoforte, so that I may expect a treat.

A "specification" of Mr. Scott's organ and some account of his performances at Boston appear this week in another column of the Musical Standard.

NOISE versus MUSIC.

Moderation in music, as in everything else, would seem to be the golden rule. On the one hand, it is important to avoid the sickly sentimentality which prompts feeble folk to a preference for very soft, sweet, slow music, and on the other side, it is equally necessary to steer clear of that boisterous love of powerful tones which especially characterizes vigorous and youthful artists, and which is so apt to cross the border line separating music from noise. Power loses something of its force unless it is conserved and reserved for use at the right moments. This lesson is more easily learnt in the practical affairs of daily life than it is in the less trodden pathways of art. The man who over-drives his horses, the engineer who wastes his steam, and the gaby who spends his money recklessly, are all objects of instantaneous and sharpest criticism; but the ignorance and stupidity of the composer who habitually employs an excess of instrumental power, and of the organist who is incessantly employing the full organ, are less amenable to public judgment, although hardly less objectionable to public taste. In the case of the composer suffering from an exuberant love of noise, society may readily protect itself by not taking the trouble to listen to his music; but in the case of the youthful organist who thinks he can best scale the heights of public estimation by firing off his artillery all at once, people have not the same chance of escaping from his organic broadsides. Lest I should be deemed impertinent for any observations I may make upon the performances of my brother organists, I must here protest that my present words are written at the prompting of a clerical friend, whose forethought, kindly interest in the organist's profession, and good taste are undeniable. And further, as I fear much unkind secret criticism in this direction is offered to the professional detriment of the criticised, I venture to think a little openly expressed advice will be readily forgiven, if not accepted. It is well to add, that the criticisms anent this matter refer chiefly to the art of accompanying. The philanthropic costermonger, who, according to schoolboy traditions, says—is a gentleman claiming general estimation. Similarly the organist who is thoroughly experienced in the art of accompanying, and rarely puts his foot upon the composition pedal which throws out all the stops, is much more likely to be esteemed as an artist, than is the organ player who musically "thrashes" and "kicks" both choir and congregation as they travel along, or it may be limp through their chants, hymns, and anthems. The organist is ever something higher than the mere executant. He is either the composer's best friend and "aide-de-camp," or his worst enemy, for he practically decides the qualities and amount of the tone-colour to be employed in illustrating the composer's ideas. More than this, the organist in church is a musical general, disposing of his forces as he will, throwing one line forward, strengthening another, and ever anxiously holding together his vocal army with such tact and prudence as will secure the most efficient, orderly and precise movements "en masse." The true economy of such a position is that of learning how to boldly use that which is obviously wanted, and at all times inclining to the sparing and reserving of that which can be safely dispensed with. The prudent organist will build up a system of careful observation; he will learn how to pick up his flat singing choristers by the use of clear rather than powerful sounding stops, especially using for this purpose the softer stops of 4-feet pitch; he will be equally expert in knowing how to calm down excited sharp singing by lessening the power employed. He will also be reserved in the employment of either strong reeds or screaming mutation stops, and will discover that judicious variety affords the best possible power. The question as regards the organist has a bearing upon the organ also. The skilful, prudent player is the only fit person to be entrusted with a large and powerful instrument, and the people who can thoroughly rely upon the judgment of such an artist, will, as far as means go, be always willing to provide an instrument worthy of such a player. All organs ought to be ample enough to flood the buildings in which they are placed with majestic tones, and to have variety enough to produce every shade of sound down almost to a distant echo. Organists ought, especially as regards the delicate art of accompanying to learn how to completely control and judiciously utilise all the varied powers of such an instrumental giant; and this matter of use and control deserves more serious study than is generally accorded to it. One thing seems absolutely necessary, this is the careful study of the instrumental accompaniments to be found in the scores of the greatest masters.

"If I'd a donkey which would'nt go,
Would I thrash him, no, no, no."

MUSIC.

The influences of music, although its language is more vague and subtle in its expression, are in some sort analogous to those of literature. It feeds the imagination, and awakens and gives play to slumbering thoughts. It stirs the finer emotions of the soul, and kindles the inspiration which belongs to poetry. Creating a sympathy with the beautiful and sublime in nature, it sharpens the sensibilities and stimulates the fancy until it blooms into the imagery of forms of material, intellectual, and moral beauty. Like literature, music gives renewed life and vigour to daily existence, and strengthens the hopes and aspirations of humanity. Dispelling the gloom which occasionally shrouds the mind, it carries the soul gently from extreme depression to supreme content. How many congenial images of beauty it suggests to the mind! What a chain of ideas is born of its spirit and influence! And upon how many nations does its plastic power leave the impress of its refining touch! Whatever the effect of music, whether it be of a sensuous, emotional, or intellectual character, its subjective influences are unmistakable, transporting us at times into a mighty realm of dreams, and tingeing with the deepest hues the primary elements of our nature, the sympathies and emotions of the heart, the imagination, the passions of the soul, and the manifestations of the religious sentiment. The influences of music are felt around the firesides of the poor as well of those of the rich; and the young, flushed with the spirit of youth, and the old, even if hardened by experience, yield alike to its mystic charms. It is curious to reflect upon the variety of thoughts and the varied emotions which find their source in music. In vain have writers sought to discover the secret of its power, and to define with anything like precision its subtle effects upon the heart and mind. The radical difficulty which at first presents itself in any attempt to solve this problem is that the effect and influence of music depend upon the temperament and the physical, mental, and moral condition of the individual. To a certain extent, the same may be said in respect to some forms of poetry and prose. But an effort to analyze the meaning of the most imaginative and mystical passages in literature would meet with a success far beyond what has yet been achieved by those who have essayed to interpret the language of the art divine. While descriptive music has undoubtedly many admirers, and has a prominent place in the works of the great masters, it has always seemed to us that the mind and feelings become fettered by being chained to the ideas of the composer. Who can listen to a fine opera without at times confessing it to be a privilege to be ignorant of the libretto? And who can listen to the music of a great master set to the words of a sickly sentimentalist without being conscious that disturbing influences are at work on both mind and body? — Providence Evening Bulletin (U.S.).

Passing Events.

Madame Nillson is now on her way to America.

Ch. Lecocq's opera, "Le Cœur et la Main," has been recently successfully produced at Daly's Theatre, New York.

It seems, unfortunately, that the Three Choirs Festival at Gloucester has left a deficiency of £313 to be met by the stewards.

The September number of Brainard's Musical World, U.S., gives a short biographical notice, with portrait, of Sir Arthur Sullivan.

The Guide to the Church Congress at Reading has been again prepared by that able littérateur and editor Mr. Charles Mackeson.

Mr. Ebenezer Prout is said to be writing an orchestral work for the Birmingham Festival of 1885. This is good news, as a musical contemporary observes.

It is stated as probable that the first performance in London of Raff's "World's End," to be produced at the Leeds Festival, will be at the Crystal Palace.

It is announced that the Birmingham Festival Committee have decided on asking Dvorák to write a work for the Festival to be held in that town in 1885.

At St. James's Hall Mr. Chas. Du Val is giving nightly at present an entertaining and spirited "Monologue of Music, Mimicry, and Character Delineation."

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught were present at a concert at Norwich lately. They congratulated Dr. Bunnett, from whom, some years ago, the Duke took lessons.

Englaender's opera, "The Prince Consort," has been translated into English, and will, it is announced, be produced this season by the Wilbur Opera Company in America.

The New York papers say, there was recently placed in the office of the County Clerk the certificate of incorporation of the Grand Conservatory of Music of the city of New York.

Mr. J. Conway Brown proposes to publish by subscription, his Sonata for pianoforte and violin which gained the prize of 10 guineas and the gold medal recently at Trinity College, London.

A young lady pianist, Miss Neally Stevens of Chicago, is returning home from Europe with the most flattering testimonials and encouragement from some of the most eminent German composers and virtuosi.

Our greater music schools are again getting into working trim, and the well-sustained influx of students at the various institutions, prove that there is no diminution in our natural love of the art.

The Ballad Concert Committee propose to extend their concert scheme this year by the performance of the "May Queen" and by the introduction of classical nights, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Thomas.

The ever hard at work Sir G. A. Macfarren has written a part-song to the words of Burns' poem, "To Mary in Heaven," for the Glasgow Select Choir, who will sing it at Mr. Austin's St. Andrew's Festival at St. James's Hall, Nov. 30th.

Mr. Mapleson has, it is said, obtained the requisite capital to enable him to finish building the new opera house on the Thames Embankment, which he proposes to open in June, 1884. This statement is, however, doubted by some.

A prospectus has been issued announcing that the Liverpool Philharmonic Concerts are to take place under Mr. Charles Hallé, on Oct. 9th, 23rd, Nov. 6th, 20th, Dec. 4th, 18th, Jan. 8th, 22nd, Feb. 5th, 19th, March 11th, and April 1st.

The Brisbane Daily Observer tells of a local meeting held under the chairmanship of Mr. W. H. Wilson, a much esteemed supporter of the art, at which it was decided to raise a fund with the object of placing a gifted young artist, Miss Fanny Atkinson, in the Royal College of Music as a New Zealand representative. The scheme has been warmly taken up.

Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, announce three Subscription Concerts at the Town Hall, with Mr Chas. Hallé's excellent band, on Nov. 12th, Jan. 14th, and Feb. 25th. The same firm also give a special Chamber Concert Dec. 7th, the artists being Mr. Chas. Hallé, Mdme. Norman-Néruda, and Miss Santley.

The proceedings of the Musical Association are in print under the care and the admirable conduct of the hon. sec., Mr. James Higgs. Papers are included by Messrs. F. Praeger, G. N. Carpari, E. J. Breakspeare, J. Turpin, G. A. Osborne, S. S. Stratton, and D. J. Blaikley. Stanley Lucas & Co. are the publishers.

Another new instrument is announced in the advertisement that "Herr Karl Hahn is playing at Crystal Palace this day, on his new instrument, the Cantus Transcendentalis, Ancient Melodies, Chinese, Hindustani, Hebrew, and Arabian, and Modern Melodies, Hungarian, Russian, and Gipsy songs from the "Tatra."

The Parish Church, Leeds, after being closed for some weeks, was re-opened on Wednesday, and a special series of services were arranged for the occasion. On the first day, Gounod in D and Barnby in E flat were sung. Anthems by Wesley, Stainer, etc., have been given during the week. During the recess the fine organ has been greatly improved.

A veteran correspondent remembers the father of Crouch (the composer of "Kathleen Mavourneen") as a violoncellist at the Ancient Concerts. In the days of the Ancient Concerts, about 1821, the violoncellists were the two Lindleys (father and son), Crouch, Ely, and Brooks. Thanks to progress and to Costa, our strings are much stronger and better balanced now.

The funeral of Miss Ellen Orridge, the lamented, much esteemed, and greatly gifted young contralto singer, took place on the 21st, at Kensal Green, in the presence of a large number of professional and private friends. Among others present were Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. Maybrick, Rev. Edward White, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Stanley Lucas, Mr. Vert, and Mr. Barnard.

Pitman's Musical Monthly has appeared for Oct. It is edited by Mr. T. Crampton, and issued at 1d., with some 8 pages of music in both notations, 4 pages of well assorted literary matter, and an admirable portrait of Madame Georgina Burns, not to add a goodly number of business announcements; the paper is good and remarkably cheap. Such a spirited start deserves well of the public, and fairly claims a future of usefulness and success.

Says Cherubino in Figaro:—Contrary to report, I believe Mr. A. C. Mackenzie has not yet begun the new opera for the Carl Rosa Company. Mr. Hueffer has, however, finished the libretto, and the composer will have to set to work at once to deliver the work in the course of the present year. Mr. Mackenzie's Norwich cantata, the libretto of which is from the pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, is more forward, and the first part is, it is understood, already completed.

Mr. Walter Macfarren has been paying a series of visits in Yorkshire, Flintshire, Somersetshire, and Cornwall. On Sept. 20th, he gave a pianoforte recital at Falmouth for the benefit of the Cornwall Home for Destitute Little Girls, and his appeal was liberally responded to by a delighted audience, who warmly appreciated the rich musical treat provided for them. The programme comprised pieces from the works of Haydn, Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, and Walter Macfarren himself.

The Banner has the following:—"A case which is suggestive to persons about to marry, and to all who are meditating the purchase of a new pianoforte, came before the court at the Old Bailey recently, when William Rutley, printer, and Telemachus Collard, carpenter, were indicted for forging and counterfeiting the trade-mark of Messrs. Collard and Collard, pianoforte makers in Cheapside. The prisoners were ultimately discharged, after giving a positive undertaking that in the future this system of imitating the trade-marks of the prosecutors should be stopped, and Collard also consented to give up the labels still in his possession, by removing them from all the pianos upon which they had been placed under his control. Although the defendants were thus acquitted, the fact remains that the system of imitating trade-marks is adopted more widely than is generally supposed.

On Sept. 6th, the organ of St. Leonard's Church, Newark, which has undergone extensive alterations, was re-opened, and a special service was held. There was a crowded congregation. In addition to the organ the band of the Yeomanry Cavalry, under the direction of the Bandmaster, Mr. Lilley, played selections of sacred music. The work of re-building was entrusted to Messrs. Harston and Sons, of Newark. They have added a swell organ with nine stops, with three additional couplers.

After passing through the fire of a natural reaction,—after undergoing the abuse of the long-haired, advanced school, who apparently hate the notion of a gentleman and a man of large general culture proving himself to be a tone-poet of a high order,—Mendelssohn's best music is still holding its own, and further, it is noticed that his best works are being actually more and more performed, and are finding an undeniable general acceptance from day to day. This is the case, too, with the greatest works of Mozart.

The prospectus of the Sacred Harmonic Society has been issued for the season. Mr. C. Hallé is again conductor, and Mr. W. H. Cummings, assistant conductor. On Nov. 16th, Macfarren's "King David" will be given under Sir A. Sullivan's direction, as he is preparing its production in Leeds. Other features of the season will be Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," and Gounod's "Redemption." The concerts will be given at St. James's Hall, and the conversazione at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly.

A choral festival will be held at the Church of SS. Augustine and Faith, Watling Street, E.C., on Friday evening next, the 5th October (being the eve of St. Faith's day), commencing at half-past seven. The music will consist of Villiers-Stanford's Evening Service in A, Schubert's Psalm "The Lord is my Shepherd," a short selection from the oratorio's of "St. Paul," and the whole of Dr. Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus"; the choir of the church being slightly augmented for the occasion, and Mr. C. E. Miller, the organist, presiding at the organ. This little church, nestling under, and almost hidden by, the neighbouring cathedral of St. Paul, was twenty years ago a pioneer of choral services in London, and is now justly noted both for its high-class and well-rendered music.

Says the Banner:—A considerable measure of success attended the second annual open-air concert at Wakefield, held on Sunday, Sept. 9th, in aid of the funds of the Clayton Hospital in that town. The weather was most favourable, and upwards of 25,000 persons attended the performance, in which between five and six hundred vocalists and instrumentalists took part. The programme included several choruses from Handel's "Messiah" and "Judas Maccabæus," and three well-known hymns. The conduct of those present was all that could be desired, and a large sum was realised for the benefit of the hospital, the offerings being received in boxes and sheets. The proceedings were opened by prayer by the Rev. A. Chalmers, Unitarian minister, and closed in a similar manner by the Rev. A. T. Curtis, vicar of St. Michael's Church. This example will very likely be followed in other towns, next season it may be fairly assumed.

With regret is announced the death of Mr. George Forbes, who, for forty-five years, was organist at St. Mary's Church, Bryanston Square. The deceased gentleman was in his seventy-first year, and for some time previous to his death had been suffering from a complication of internal complaints. It was not, however, until lately that his illness caused any anxiety to his friends, as he seemed as strong and hearty as ever. On Sunday, August 5th,—the induction day of the new Rector, the Rev. the Hon. Canon Leigh,—after presiding at the organ, Mr. Forbes complained of feeling very ill, and, at his request, two of his friends connected with the church saw him safely to his residence. After a rest of some days, Mr. Forbes resumed his duties as organist, but on Sunday, the 26th ult., he had a relapse, and never again left his bed. The loss sustained by St. Mary's will be very deeply felt, as both in and out the church deceased's genial nature and kindliness of heart were well known and appreciated by a large circle of friends. Mr. Forbes was a talented and industrious musician, composing, arranging, playing, and teaching with such marked ability, as to have secured the estimation of a large musical connection.

It is announced that Herr Pollini, the director of the Hamburg Theatre, has been fortunate enough to discover a new tenor of the first rank, Herr Gustav Memmler, who has just made a brilliant début in the very trying part of Tristan.

The evenings following the days of military display in the neighbourhood of Homburg have been devoted to plays and operas performed before the imperial and royal visitors. On the 22nd was given a gala performance of "Carmen," with Mdme. Trebelli in the title part, at the Kurhaus Theatre.

La Gazetta Musicale of Milan, in reviewing Sir A. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," says "The appearance of a new work from one of the most illustrious of English composers is to be regarded as an event of great importance;" says further "The work is most beautiful, the style elevated and good in character;" and concludes "we offer hearty congratulations to Sir A. Sullivan."

The statement that the Vatican archives will shortly be opened to the public, and that the only thing necessary to gain admission will be sending a note to the librarian stating the kind of study about to be undertaken, are matters of exceptional interest to the students of all branches of science, literature, and art. It is indeed a matter of congratulation that His Holiness, the Pope, has thus departed from the old restrictive and protective policy, and decided upon allowing the world to know something of the unequalled treasures of the Vatican. Musicians will anxiously look forward to some information to be gained from the visits of experts regarding the musical works, and books yielding information concerning the art to be found in the Vatican.

One characteristic feature of the recent German military manœuvres was the performance, on the evening of the 28th, by way of welcome to the German Emperor, of the great tattoo by the combined bands of the Army Corps, massed as one band, and numbering no less than 1,012 bandsmen, fifers, and drummers. The programme includes,—March, "Queen of Saba," by Gounod; Festival-Overture, by Fisher; Finale of 3rd act "Rienzi," by Wagner; Fanfare militaire, by Asher; and the great tattoo. It is strange that a similar combination of military bands is not attempted elsewhere, though in England it is to be feared unexpected difficulties would arise in the way of ill-advised selections of instruments, and want of agreement as regards pitch.

M. Louis Besson of the Paris Evénement, tells the following pleasant little story:—"The other day a poor woman was endeavouring to earn a little money by singing in the Rue de Sentier. She was enfeebled with cold and hunger, and her voice was hoarse with the effects of a sore throat. Suddenly her strength failed and she sank on the pavement. At this moment a young pupil at the Conservatoire, Mdlle. Anna Drousart—why not tell her name?—came out of the opposite house and perceived the unfortunate singer. She tended her with every possible care and gave her money. But, not being very rich herself, she conceived the idea of putting herself in the woman's place. So the inhabitants of the street were surprised to hear all at once a fresh and lovely soprano voice singing without accompaniment Gounod's "Ave Maria" and the "Berceuse" from "L'Africaine." All the windows were thrown open, as may be imagined, and contributions poured in so liberally, that the poor woman returned home with the sum of eighty-five francs, which Mdlle. Drousart had thus cheerfully earned for her."

The London Music Company, having commenced operations at 54, Great Marlborough-street, have issued a wonderfully cheap list of useful pianofortes. But as regards the advancement of the art, their proposals anent the publishing of new music, are perhaps the most important. They announce that a jury of three musicians will examine works offered for publication, the decision of these gentlemen being accepted by the company, who are already prepared to receive MSS. This scheme is one likely under good management to exercise an important influence for the good of the art, and the proposal claims public attention and support.

APPOINTMENT.

Mr. J. FLAVELL, pupil of Hugh Brooksbank, Esq., Mus. Bac., of Llandaff Cathedral, has been appointed Organist and Choirmaster of Worksop Abbey.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

A DREAM.

I amuse myself sometimes in the sleepless hours of night, when the simpler devices of counting a flock of sheep leaping over a style, or saying the alphabet backwards, fail to bring the sweet god of forgetfulness, by picturing to myself what I would do if I had a great fortune; till presently I fall into a kind of waking dream which usually takes something like the following shape:—

I have been left a comfortable competency of a million a year safely resulting from a respectable investment in Government three-per-cents. I very naturally ask myself what I can do with the money so as to secure the greatest enjoyment for myself coupled with a certain amount of good to my fellow men. As I am a musician, it equally naturally follows that I determine to endow a musical institution, and as I am a Wagnerian pur sang, the form that institution takes is a theatre on strict Wagnerian principles, where, however, not only the master's works, but really great operas of all other schools shall be performed, totally regardless of expense, in strict and reverend accord with the intentions of their creators. To this end the first object is the building. This is to be erected on a gentle eminence which rears its modest head close to Sherborne, for Sherborne presents many advantages which even Bayreuth cannot boast of. It is but three hours from London; it lies on the main line of the South-Western Railway, so that all who care to come to my performances can get here easily; the hotel accommodation is good, but of that I cannot speak more particularly lest I be accused of insinuating a cheap advertisement into these widely-read columns. But the main thing in its favour is, that the inhabitants of this town—as indeed all West-country folk—are passionately fond of music and are also very proud of all their town institutions; witness the noble abbey, the town-hall, and the Digby Memorial-hall, which latter has not been built yet, but is vastly talked about. Here, then, on this pleasing eminence, I will erect a noble theatre that shall in all its essentials conform strictly to the Bayreuth original, while in its details, and especially in the materials of which it is built, it will far transcend its prototype. Everything about it is to be massive and rich, but nothing gaudy or luxurious; indeed, the ornamental accessories shall be confined mainly to the exterior, which cannot be too handsome. The auditorium, on the other hand, is to be left as plain as possible, having regard to the strict requirements of good taste only. Nothing meretricious, nothing that shall for a moment attract the eye from the stage, shall find any tolerance. The stage, indeed, is to be the main object of the whole building, and on it all that modern engineering skill, all that modern art and science are capable of, shall be freely lavished. The mechanical arrangements are to be as nearly perfect as anything human can be, and I rely upon electricity not only for illumination but for many other aids undreamt of even by Wagner. The scenery is to be entirely under the control of the prompter, so that the most elaborate sets can be removed and others equally elaborate put in their place merely by touching a knob,—and all instantaneously and noiselessly. Such a thing as a carpenter's scene will be quite unknown; on the other hand, by calling in the assistance of the very greatest artists only, I hope to produce pictures in "Parsifal" and the "Nibelungen" such as the wildest idealism must be content with. I calculate that for about £250,000 I ought to get the kind of building I want, but of course I am prepared to go to any further sum that may be needed. Grouped round my theatre there will be a small city of tasteful detached houses, in which all my artists will live, each receiving a house and garden suited to his wants rent free. And this brings me to the most elaborate and costly part of my scheme—though money is really no object whatever—the constitution and maintenance of my personnel. My orchestra, (the most important part of any operatic establishment, though it has not hitherto been recognised as such) will consist of about 25 first and 25 second violins, 20 violas, 20 'cellos and 25 basses, of which 12 will use the 4-stringed instruments. There will also be two contra double basses of 32-feet tone, 6 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, 2 bass clarinets, 2 corno inglese, 4 bassoons, 2 contra bassoons, 6 harps, 8 horns, 6 trumpets, 8 trombones, 2 serpents, 2 tubas, 2 sets of kettle-drums (3 in each set), big drum and cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, etc., making with extras a respectable total, of say, 180 performers for the orchestra before the stage. But, of course, I shall have a splendid organ on the stage and a complete military band, so that the total may reasonably be placed at 240 members. These will receive a liberal salary, graduated upon the importance of their various instruments and also upon their own individual merits, but no member of my orchestra shall receive less than £500 a year, which, with a house rent free, coal and gas and no taxes (income-tax being paid by me), ought to enable him to live like a gentleman. Indeed, very important qualifications for membership in my orchestra will be—gentlemanliness of behaviour, a generous instinct for art, and the loftiest moral tone. On the stage, the establishment will consist of 50 picked artists of the highest calibre, not including, however, stars of such prodigious vocal powers as to absorb an unfair amount of attention, and a carefully chosen chorus of 150 voices. These shall also receive salaries beginning at £500, with the same privileges in the way of house-rent, etc. as the orchestra. I shall altogether expect to have a pleasant little salary list of about £500,000 or £600,000 a year; but in return for that, I shall have gathered together such a body of artists as will be quite unmatched. While the theatre and the city are being built, this great phalanx will be set to work studying some of the first works of our future répertoire, and getting acquainted with each other. When the theatre is ready, what a festival we shall have at the opening! Imagine the sight! There on the pleasing hill will tower the lofty edifice, standing alone on a fair lawn set about with flowers and fountains and approached by gently sloping carriage-drives. Round it, in a semicircle, cluster the pretty villas of the artists. There will be no Church because the various places of worship in Sherborne will amply suffice for all our needs, but there will be a special school in which every form of useful knowledge will be taught, including music, both theoretical and practical. Imagine the beautiful town, in which architecture shall be encouraged to display its fairest forms, even on the humblest building, so that it shall be a model for all the world, swarming with bright-faced artists, safe from all anxiety (I need not say that anyone found worthy to join the Sherborne Theatre will never be dismissed), and mingling freely with the guests who have come from all the ends of the world to assist at our opening performance of "Parsifal."

As rest is as needful to the body and mind as air, there will only be three operatic performances a week in the theatre, the intervals being dedicated to enjoyment or to needful rehearsals. No work will be presented before it has been rehearsed, with full accessories, at least twelve times, but of course nothing will be produced till there is absolutely no flaw whatever in the performance. And what a répertoire we shall have! The operas of Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, one or two of Meyerbeer's, one or two of Verdi's, one or two of Gounod's, and, of course, all Wagner's, will form the foundation; but I shall rely upon a great school of dramatic composition, springing up almost immediately in England; for every work sent in will be carefully and fairly examined, and if found answering the first requirements, will be as carefully rehearsed, as if for a long run, and will then be produced in the presence of the composer only. And if he likes it, it will find a place in the general répertoire.

I have not quite settled yet on what system the public is to be admitted to my theatre. There is a doubt in my mind whether I will admit them at all in a general sense. Of course, all admission will be free, if there is any, and students from distant countries will indeed receive subsidies to enable them to assist at our performances. But one class, the critics, will be required to pay, and pay rather heavily, for their places; in the first place, because, as I shall only employ the greatest performers, and produce the greatest masterpieces, critics will be quite unnecessary; and in the second because this is the only safe means of ensuring a perfectly unbiassed report.

My brain is in a whirl when I think of the blessings my theatre will bring upon England. She will spring at once into the foremost place among musical nations: composers, dramatic singers, orchestral players, will occupy a new position, and an era will dawn for my beloved art such as it has never yet passed through.

Have I forgotten anything? Oh yes, the conductor! At this point, I grieve to say, my waking dream, gradually slips into a waking nightmare, and I finish by picturing MYSELF conducting this vast and glorious combination; and during the performance of one of my own operas,—I fall gently asleep.

THE CANTUS TRANCENDENTALIS.

The Orchestra thus describes a new instrument: The Cantus Transcendentalis, an invention of Mr. Karl Hahn from Blasenwetz near Dresden, has attracted considerable attention in the musical circles of Germany. The highest testimonials and approbations have been granted to Mr. Hahn by Professor J. Joachim, Professor von Helmholtz, H.M. the King of Saxony, and the press. The Cantus contains five octaves of keys, from F to F, and resembles in shape a small table standing on two legs. The principal novelties and improvements are:—1. A singular tone, very noble, impressive, and with a great variety of expression. 2. An apparatus to vibrate slowly or quickly like a human voice, and to regulate the vibration according to the required expression or to cause the vibration to cease. 3. A sounding-board, directing the full sound towards the hearer, and avoiding any loss of tone. 4. A prolongation, which enables the player to keep as many tones as he likes sounding and increasing to any length, without resting the fingers on the keys. This contrivance replaces the pedal effect in many cases and allows the player to produce chords five octaves in compass. Mr. Hahn produced this instrument for the first time at the Crystal Palace, where it was highly appreciated by the audience. It is said that Mr. Hahn will reside for a short time in London, 36, Oxford Terrace, W., where the new instrument may be seen and further particulars obtained. The price, it is understood, will be about fifteen guineas.

NOTES ABOUT PAGANINI.

The succeeding extracts are reprinted from Musical Opinion:—

The singular personality of Paganini displayed itself in his private, no less than in his artistic life; and a few out of the many anecdotes told of him will be of interest, as throwing fresh light on the man. Paganini was accused of being selfish and miserly, of caring little even for his art, except as a means of accumulating money. While there is much in his life to justify such an indictment, it is no less true that he on many occasions displayed great generosity. He was always willing to give concerts for the benefit of his fellow artists, and for other charitable purposes, and on more than one occasion bestowed large sums of money for the relief of distress. We may assume that he was niggardly by habit and generous by impulse. Utterly ignorant of everything except the art of music, bred under the most unfortunate and demoralizing conditions, the fact that his character was on the whole so naïve and upright speaks eloquently for the native qualities of his disposition. His eccentricities, perhaps, justified the unreasoning vulgar in believing that he was slightly crazed. His appearance and manner on the platform were fantastic in the extreme, and rarely failed to provoke ridicule, till his magic turned all other emotions into one of breathless admiration. He talked to himself continually when alone, a habit which was partly responsible for the belief that he was always attended by a familiar demon. When a stranger was introduced to him, his corpse-like face became galvanized into a ghastly smile, which produced a singular impression, half fascinating, half repulsive. He was taciturn in society, except among his intimates, when his buoyant spirits bubbled out in a polyglot tongue, for he never knew any language well except his own. Naturally irritable, his quick temper was inflamed by intestinal disease, which racked him with a suffering that was aggravated by a nostrum, in the use of which he indulged freely. Indeed, it was said by his friends, that his death was accelerated by his devotion to medical quackery, from a belief in which no arguments could wean him.

To his fellow artists he was always polite and attentive, though they annoyed him by their persistent curiosity as to the means by which he produced his unrivalled effects—effects which the established technique of violin-playing could not explain. An Englishman, named George Harris, who was an attaché of the Hanoverian Court, attended Paganini for a year as his private secretary, and he asserts that Paganini was never seen to practise a single note of music in private. His astonishing dexterity was kept up to its pitch by the numerous concerts which he gave, and by his exquisitely delicate organization. He was accustomed to say that his whole early life had been one of prodigious and continual study, and that he could afford to repose in after years. Paganini's knowledge of music was profound and exact, and the most difficult music was mere child's play to him. Pasini, a well-known painter, living at Parma, did not believe the stories told of Paganini's ability to play the most difficult music at sight. Being the possessor of a valuable Stradiuarius violin, he challenged our artist to play, at first hand, a manuscript concerto which he placed before him. "This instrument shall be yours," he said, "if you can play in a masterly manner that concerto at first sight." The Genoese took the violin in his hand, saying: "In that case, my friend, you may bid adieu to it at once," and he immediately threw Pasini into ecstatic admiration by his performance of the piece. There is little doubt that this is the Stradiuarius instrument left by Paganini to his son, and valued at about £600.

He was very fond of his little son Achille. A French gentleman tells us that he called once to take Paganini to dine with him. He found the artist's room in great disorder. A violin on the table with manuscript music, another upon a chair, a snuff-box on the bed along with his child's toys, music, money, letters, articles of dress—all pell-mell; nor were the tables and chairs in their proper places. Everything was in the most conspicuous confusion. The child was out of temper; something had vexed him; he had been told to wash his hands; and, while the little one gave vent to the most violent bursts of temper, the father stood as calm and quiet as the most accomplished of nurses. He merely turned quietly to his visitor, and said, in melancholy accents: "The poor child is cross; I do not know what to do to amuse him; I have played with him since morning, and I cannot stand it any longer."

In the early part of the present century the facilities for travel were far less convenient than at the present time, and it was always an arduous undertaking to one in Paganini's frail condition of health. He was, however, generally cheerful while jolting along in the post-chaise, and chattered incessantly as long as his voice held out. Harris tells us that the artist was in the habit of getting out when the horses were changed, to stretch his long limbs after the confinement of the carriage. Often he extended his promenades, when he became interested in the town through which he was passing, and would not return till long after the fresh horses had been harnessed, thereby causing much annoyance to the driver. On one occasion Jehu swore if it occurred again he would drive on and leave his passenger behind to get along as best he could. The secretary, Harris, was enjoying a nap, and the driver was true to his resolution at the next stopping place, leaving Paganini behind. This made much trouble, and a special coach had to be sent for the enraged artist, who was found sputtering oaths in half a dozen different languages. Paganini refused to pay for the carriage, and it was only by force of law that he reluctantly settled the bill.

His baggage was always of the plainest description; in fact, ludicrously simple. A shabby box contained his precious Guarnerius fiddle, and served also as a portmanteau wherein to pack his jewellery, his linen, and sundry trifles. In addition to this he carried a small travelling bag and a hat-box. Mr. Harris tells us that Paganini was in eating and drinking exceedingly frugal. Table indulgence was forbidden him by the condition of his health, as any deviation from the strictest diet resulted in great suffering. He was a thorough Italian in all his habits and ideas. Among other traits was a great disdain for the lower classes, though he was by no means subservient to the people of rank and wealth. It was his habit, when an inferior addressed him, to enquire of his companion, "What does this animal want with me?" If he was pleased with his coachman, he would say, "That animal drives well." This seemed not so much the vulgar arrogance of a small nature, elevated above the class in life from which it sprang, as that pride of great gifts, which made the freemasonry of genius the measure by which he judged all others, noble and simple. Like all men of highly nervous constitution, he was keenly susceptible to both enjoyment and suffering. He was so sensitive to atmospheric changes that his irritability was excessive during a thunderstorm. He would then remain silent for hours together, while his eyes rolled and his limbs twitched convulsively. Such fragile, nervous, highly sensitive organizations are not unfrequenty characteristic of men of great genius, and in the Italian violinist it was developed in an abnormal degree.

The circumstances accompanying the last scenes of Paganini's life are very interesting. He had been intimate with most of the great people of Europe, among them, Lord Byron, Sir Clifford Constable, Lord Holland, Rossini, Ugo Foscolo, Monti, Prince Jerome, the Princess Eliza, and most of the great painters, poets, and musicians of his age. For Lord Byron he had a most ardent and exaggerated admiration. Paganini had stopped at Nice on his way from Paris, detained by extreme debility, for his last hours were drawing near. Under the blue sky and balmy air of this Mediterranean paradise the great musician somewhat recovered his strength at first. One night he sat by his bedroom window, surrounded by a circle of intimate friends, watching the glories of the Italian sunset that emblazoned earth, air, and sky, with the richest dyes of nature's pallet. A soft breeze swept into the room, heavy with the perfumes of flowers, and the twittering of the birds in the green foliage, mingled with the hum of talk from the throngs of gay promenaders sauntering on the beech. For a while Paganini sat silently absorbed in watching the joyous scene, when suddenly his eyes turned on a picture of Lord Byron that hung on the wall. A flash of enthusiasm lightened his face, as if a great thought were struggling to the surface, and he seized his violin to improvize. The listeners declared that this "swan song" was the most remarkable production of his life. He illustrated the stormy and romantic career of the English poet in music. The accents of doubt, irony, and despair, mingled with the cry of liberty, and the tumult of triumph.

Musical Intelligence.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Our coming musical season promises to be one of great interest and activity. The second series of Mr. Charles Hallé's Grand Orchestral Concerts, promoted by Messrs. Alderson and Brentall, will take place in the Town Hall, on November 12th, 1883, January 14th, and February 25th, 1884. Among the items on the programme, for the first concert, are:—Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, one of Svendsen's "Rhapsodies Norvegiennes," and Mendelssohn's "Serenade and Allegro Giojoso," with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Hallé will be the solo pianist, and Mr. Straus the leader of the orchestra. The vocalist engaged for the first concert is Mr. Santley.

Another great feature during the coming season will be the Special Chamber Concert, promoted by Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall, which will be held in the Town Hall, on December 7th. The artists engaged are:—Mdme. Norman-Néruda (violin), Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte), and Miss Santley (vocalist). As the pieces are truly popular, and the artists of first rank, the Town Hall is likely to be crowded to the doors.

The prospectus of Mr. W. Rea's three Subscription Concerts has been issued; but the dates have not yet been fixed for them. No doubt the concerts will bewor thy of the reputation of their able and experienced conductor.

The first of the Chamber Music Society's concerts will take place on November 19th. Among the artists engaged are:—Herr Joachim, Mr. Henry Holmes, Signor Piatti, etc. Mr. Henry Holmes will lead the violin quartet which perform at the first concert.

The Annual General Meeting of the Newcastle Amateur Choral Society was held on September 27th, in the Church of England Institute. The works for this season are:—Van Bree's Dramatic Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," Lock's, "Macbeth," and a special arrangement of the choruses from Rossini's opera "La Donna del Lago." Notwithstanding this society has laboured under many disadvantages, it has wonderfully improved under the bâton of its talented conductor, Mr. J. McCallum.

"The Liebe-Heimlicher Trio," Mdme. Terese Liebe (violinist), Mdme. Heimlicher (pianist), and Mr. Liebe (violoncellist), have been performing last week, before crowded and delighted audiences, at the Promenade Concerts, given at the Central Exchange Art Gallery. Mdme. Terese Liebe is a great favourite here, where her talent as violinist is much admired.

After being completely renovated during the vacation, the Theatre Royal, with its chastely decorated interior, and many beauties, is a perfect little gem of its kind; and Messrs. Howard and Wyndham may be heartily congratulated on the success of their venture.

Lately Miss Florence St. John and her Comic Opera Company (under the management of M. Marius), have played with the greatest success, at the Theatre Royal, two of Jeuback's operas, "Lurette" and "Madame Favart." And during this week Miss Kate Santley's Opera Company has been performing the clever production of Messrs. Fred. Clay and George R. Sims, entitled "The Merry Duchess," before delighted and crowded houses. The pleasing music, well rendered by a good company, combined with the witty libretto, and fine mounting of the whole, is likely to make this opera as popular in the provinces as it has been in London.

H. W.

The complaints as to the continued absence of any consideration of the vital subject of Church Music at the Church Congress are heard on every side. The special correspondent of a contemporary writing from Reading says:—To the regret of very many, for some years now, a charming item has been cut out of the scheme—namely, the evening devoted to church music, with illustrations by such choirs as were available. The practice was begun at Manchester just twenty years ago, and the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Dr. E. G. Monk, and Mr. W. H. Monk read the papers. Dr. Dykes was the lecturer at Norwich, and the following year the present Lord Chancellor, then Sir Roundell Palmer, read a most interesting paper on Hymnology. Next year Ouseley and Helmore were the chief speakers. At subsequent congresses Dr. Gauntlett, E. H. Bickersteth, Drs. Stainer, Spark, Hullah, and Mr. Barnby spoke upon the art in which they were masters. Since Swansea no special place has been given to church music in the Congress programme.

CORK INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

On Tuesday evening, the 25th inst., the greatest musical event of the Exhibition, viz., the performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," came off in the large hall of the building before an audience numbering several thousand persons. The oratorio, with the exception of two slight cuts of part of each of the choruses "Woe to him" and "But the Lord," was performed entire by the members of the "Cork Musical Society" under the baton of Mr. J. C. Marks, Mus.Doc., Oxon. The following vocalists were engaged as principals:—soprani, Misses Marian Fenna and Lucy Ashton Hackett; contralto, Miss Helen d'Alton; Mr. Walter Bapty; bass, Mr. J. Sullivan, the minor parts being taken by Miss F. C. Marks and Messrs. R. M. Keatinge, D. F. Shea, and E. Hackett. The chorus consisted of 294 voices divided as follows: Soprani, 104; contralti, 59; tenor, 51; bassi, 80; which together with the orchestra, numbering 52 members, made the very respectable ensemble of 346, exclusive of principals.

The faults to be found with the performance itself were, I am happy to say, but few and far between. The contralti were decidedly weak, as were also the tenori, though not so noticeably as the former, their apparent knowledge of it themselves unfortunately, however, provoking a tendency to force the tone at times.

The orchestra, owing probably to the number of extra hands got for the occasion, were not altogether as perfect as could be wished. This was plainest to be seen in the recitative "Now Cherith's Brook," and the aria, "Lord God of Abraham," the instruments not playing well together. Here, also, in the accompaniment of some of the recitatives, one of the principal defects in the organ showed up in its not speaking quick enough in answer to the pressure of the keys, causing a short series of syncopations never dreamt of by the composer. Neither was the band powerful enough for such a mass of voices. For instance: the ornate accompaniment to the chorus "Baal! hear and answer," and the beautiful figure for the strings in the chorus, "Behold, God the Lord" (Novello's ed., p. 160, bar 13 to end of movement) being, except to those seated quite close to the orchestra, undistinguishable amid the mass of voices and instruments. This, however, is partly due to the acoustical properties of the hall not being very good. The choruses were rendered throughout with an excellence and precision that speaks well for the care taken with the rehearsals by the conductor.

Of Miss Helen D'Alton's singing of her part it is almost unnecessary to speak, but it would be unfair not to refer to her excellent rendering of "Woe unto them" and "O, rest in the Lord," to the former of which, if there was any choice, I should most unhesitatingly give the palm. Miss Fenna throughout sustained her part as first soprano very well, "Hear ye, Israel" being deserving of praise. Miss Hackett, though not having a heavy part did what she had to do with a conscientious regard for the intentions of the composer. Of Mr. Sullivan, as Elijah, the hardest work naturally fell, and right well he acquitted himself. In the aria, "Is not his word like a fire?" he was not so successful, his voice not being flexible enough to give the running passages with the necessary vigour, and they were somewhat slurred over in consequence, but, in "Lord God of Abraham," and "It is enough," his really magnificent voice showed to great advantage. Mr. Bapty was also very successful in his singing, particularly in "With all your hearts," gaining over the audience thus early in the evening. Mr. J. Osborne Marks, Mus.Doc., T.C.D. presided at the organ.

It is a great pleasure to think that such a number of amateurs can, in a provincial city like Cork, be got to work together so earnestly in the production of a work like the "Elijah," and with such excellent results. It only proves what the writer has held forth all along: that the stuff is there and all that is wanting is the raison d'être for putting forth their strength. It is only natural that when the singers see the conductor going through the rehearsal in a slovenly manner that they should also fall into a slovenly way of following him; but, so also, as in the present instance, when they see their conductor going energetically to work, they begin to take an interest in what they are doing with the result of a good performance.

Unfortunately, too, the generality of the local press do nothing but praise both bad and good, with, it is needless to say, the result of making the performers quite careless.

St. John's, Angell Town.—The Harvest Festival commenced on St. Michael's day, September 29th. The music included Stainer's Service in A; Anthems, "Glorious is Thy Name" (Mozart), and "O Lord, how manifold" (Barnby). Mr. W. J. Winbolt conducted with care and skill. Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist. The Rev. Dr. Sparrow Simpson intoned the prayers, and the Rev. R. B. Dowling was the preacher.

Taunton.—A concert was given on September 27th, in aid of the funds of the Philharmonic Association, by a number of ladies and gentlemen, under the conductorship of Mr. T. P. Dudeney. Two chief items of the programme were G. A. Macfarren's Trio in A, for violin, violoncello and pianoforte, and Mendelssohn's Duet Sonata in B flat, for violoncello and pianoforte. Many of the pieces were well rendered to the pleasure of the audience, which it is to be regretted was not a larger one.

Burton-on-Trent.—The annual thanksgiving services for the ingathering of the harvest, were held in St. Paul's Church, last Sunday. The order of service for the evening was as follows:—"Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis," Tuckerman in E flat; Anthem, trio, "On Thee each living soul awaits," and chorus, "The heavens are telling" (Haydn). Bach's "Toccata and Fuga in D minor," was played as a concluding voluntary by the organist, Mr. A. B. Plant, Mus. Bac. Oxon., F.C.O.

DECLINE OF CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

A discussion, it is announced, on the decline of congregational singing took place at the recent meeting of the South-Eastern Clerical and Lay Church Alliance, held at Canterbury. The Rev. J. B. Whiting, vicar of St. Luke's, Ramsgate, said that in the last twenty years he had visited 600 parishes, and his experience was that choral singing was increasing, and congregational singing was very much diminishing. A spirited discussion followed, which, however, turned upon small points of ritual, and consequently bore little or no fruit. That congregations sing less need not be taken as a sign of decadence in any direction. It may indeed be a hopeful proof of increased intelligence in listening, combined with a lively desire to fulfil the Apostolic injunction to sing with the "understanding," as well as with the heart. Although the people have a right to join in singing certain things, they have no more just right to monopolise the ministry of singing than they have that of preaching. It has been observed that the more people know of music, the less inclined are they to rashly intrude their unprepared efforts in that ill-regulated institution, congregational singing; again, it is said, "musicians rarely sing in Church, they know how to listen." So it may be hoped that indirectly the recent discussion will lead to some good. And much good would be realised if the whole question could be judiciously approached, apart from all prejudices and habits, both doctrinal and musical.

THE HISTORY OF THE PIANOFORTE.

The following words are extracted from an appendix to Mr. A. J. Hipkins's paper, with corrections, from the Journal of the Society of Arts:—

The analysis of my paper, by Mr. Victor Mahillon, while occupied with the French translation of it, has shown the necessity of further revision than was possible at the time of publication. The most important correction is this—"Now if the string be struck upon a loop." The statement thus introduced must be brought into agreement with Thomas Young's law which I had, for the moment, overlooked. According to this law, a stretched string set in vibration by percussion, or otherwise, loses, if the disturbance takes place upon a nodal division, not only the harmonic proper to that node, but all the harmonics which have a node corresponding to the same point. The usual striking place in a piano being on or near one of the most important nodal divisions, either the eighth or the ninth, it results that augmentation of intensity may be attributed to the greater amplitude and vibrating energy of the larger segment of the string produced by the suppression of the harmonic proper to the node. As to the relative value of the different harmonic divisions arising from the varying position of the point of disturbance, the first division, that of the octave, which takes place at the half of the string, and completely annuls the even series of harmonics, engenders a timbre, or sound quality, resembling that of the clarinet, fuller and richer than any other to be obtained from the instrument. The next best measurements, tried dulcimer fashion with a suitable hammer, are those which correspond to the third, fourth, sixth, and eighth of the string. Of all these, the last division only, from obvious reasons of construction, is possible in a pianoforte. The fifth and seventh are less favourable than the third or fourth. At the sixth, the quality of tone becomes harder, as the tone regulator well knows. This tendency increases in proportion with the diminution of the division for the striking place, until the oboe quality is attained, due to the favouring of the very high harmonics at the expense of the deeper. The "lute" stop of a harpsichord with the quill plectrum acting close to the bridge might be appropriately called the "oboe" stop from this peculiar nasal quality.

While harpsichords and spinets had their strings agitated mechanically, at distances varying between a fourth and a seventh, I have not myself met with an example of a grand pianoforte struck so low down even as the seventh. In Broadwood's grand pianos, now struck exactly at the eighth, the seventh and ninth harmonics are distinctly audible, while the eighth is obliterated; the force of the blow at the eighth division does not therefore annul the neighbouring harmonics—that is to say, the seventh and the ninth. In old spinets and harpsichords no attention was paid to the point of disturbance, although we find the younger Hans Ruckers obtaining a modification in quality by using two registers of crowquill plectra on one string. His nephew, Jan Couchet, went further with this idea of varying lengths of string and striking place, an idea which Huygens fostered ("Jongbloet and Land's Collection of Huygens' Musical Correspondence.") In the grand pianoforte, John Broadwood's division of the sound-board bridge rendered a more favourable striking-place for the bass strings possible. I believe John Broadwood was the first to carry out, in grand and square pianos, the idea of a rational striking distance. A few years later (A.D. 1800), Young formulated his law, already referred to. Kutsing ("Das Wissenschaftliche der Fortepiano Baukunst.") Berne, 1844, was subsequently empirically enabled to assert that the best quality was obtained in a pianoforte at the eighth of the string, without having recourse to a softening of the hammer covering—indispensable when the blow was directed to the ninth. From what precedes, it may be asserted that there is no foundation whatever for the current notion, which Helmholtz has reproduced, that pianoforte makers have sought the seventh or ninth of the string, in order to banish one of those comparatively dissonant harmonics, and leave the concordant eighth to form part of the harmonic sheaf combined in the note. Where they have used the ninth, and even shorter divisions—as has been customary in the trebles—it has been done, without theory, to gain a more brilliant effect.

The sentence, "has been called the soul," should be, "may be called the nervous system." I have made inquiry about the wood used in America for pianoforte sound-boards, and learn from Mr. Dolge, who is a practical authority, that it is the Abies alba, a wood of rather softer texture than the European Abies excelsa, the spruce, which includes the Haselfichte of the Bavarian highlands, used in the best fiddle making.

The acquisition, since my paper was read, by Mr. Victor Mahillon of an upright grand piano by Friederici, of Gera, dated 1745, corrects my information as to date; moreover, on this instrument he inscribed his name, Friederici. The mechanism of this upright grand piano is very simple, the hammer action resembling that German clock-bell action which Mr. Mahillon, having seen another example at Nuremberg, suggests may have been transferred to the piano; of course independent of Cristofori's invention, to which it would be mechanically inferior.

Nannette Stein's six pedals are thus arranged, beginning from the left foot:—1, shift pedal; 2, bassoon; 3, damper; 4, half-celeste; 5, full celeste; 6, drum, Steibelt, "Methode de Piano." Paris, 1805, describes the first four pedals only, and gives signs for their employment.

The treble dampers were first omitted in grand pianos about 1809. In the original square pianos of Zumpe, the dampers were used throughout. In John Broadwood's square piano of 1780 one note is left undamped, the highest. In 1792 he had the eight highest notes undamped in a similar instrument, evidently to gain "ring," as with his brass damper it was not a question of convenience.

The Lyre pedal was introduced in its first form in 1809-10.

The promised production of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The May Queen," for the first time on the stage, is postponed to October 16th.

The Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace will enter on their twenty-eight season on October 13th—nine more performances taking place before Christmas, the remaining ten concerts beginning on February 16th and ending on April 19th; the usual supplemental performance for the benefit of Mr. Manns, the conductor, being announced for April 26th. Among the specialties are the orchestral symphony, "Zur Herbstzeit" (Autumn), and an Italian suite by the late Joachim Raff, a pianoforte concerto by Anton Dvorak, Sir Arthur Sullivan's incidental music to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," and a repetition of Berlioz's "Messe des Morts." Accepted classical works will not be overlooked in the scheme of these famous performances.

WALMERSLEY.

An organ recital was given in Christ Church, on Tuesday, September 25th, by Mr. W. T. Best, on the new organ (which has two manuals and Pedal), built by W. Hill and Son, London, and presented to this Church by James Jardine, Esq., of Alderley Edge, Manchester. The following was the programme:—

Organ Sonata, No. 5, in D major	Mendelssohn.
Andante in A major	Smart.
Bell-Rondo ("Rondo de'Campanelli")	Morandi.
Fugue in G major	Wesley.
Adagio Solenne	Dussek.
Prelude and Fugue in C minor	Bach.
Festal March	Best.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

On September 29th, Mr. W. S. Hoyte was the organist. A very large and enthusiastic audience attended. Miss Helen D'Alton was the vocalist, singing the evergreen "Lost Chord" with much effect, and, of course, with the inevitable and enthusiastic encore. Mr. Hoyte's first piece, a "Grand Fantasie de Concert," by M. Callaerts, the organist of Antwerp Cathedral, was admirably performed, and loudly applauded. The next solo, a Polonaise, by Rubinstein, was so effectively rendered as to secure an encore. Guilmant's "Canzone" and Best's masterly "Scherzo" were capitally received. A fine performance of Krebs' Prelude and Fugue in C minor, was also well received. Guilmant's "Grand March Triomphale" closed a very effective series of organ pieces, well calculated to display Mr. Hoyte's broad, vigorous style, and excellent execution. The arrangements for the future interlude, Mr. W. S. Best, on October 20th, and Dr. Peace, on the 27th. The organist, this evening, will be Mr. Walter Wesche, who makes his first appearance upon this occasion.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. Eyre's programme, on Saturday last included the following:—

Grand Offertoire in F	Wely.
Minuet and Trio, from G minor Symphony	Bennett.
Aria, "Che faro Senza Eurydice" ("Orpheus")	Gluck.
Grand Prelude in E flat	Martini.
"The Lost Chord"	Sullivan.
Intermezzo	Macbeth.
Larghetto, from a Trio	Mozart.
Allegretto, "Autrefois"	Richards.
Polonaise in C	Rubenstien.

And on Saturday, the 22nd ult.:—

"Cornelius" March	Mendelssohn.
Adagio from a quartet	Onslow.
Elegy in C minor	Stephens.
(In memoriam, Ellen A. Orridge, died 16th September, 1883.)
Offertoire in G	Kuhmstedt.
"Cradle Song"	Lange.
March from Suite No. 1	Lachner.
Organ Concerto, No. 2, in B flat	Handel.
Selection of Airs, "Faust"	Gounod.
Chorus, "Welcome mighty king" ("Solomon")	Handel.

FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

The following organ recitals have been given during the week by Mr. J. Loaring, F.C.O. The programmes included:—

Triumphal March, "Alfred"	Prout.
Overture, "Men of Prometheus"	Beethoven.
Prelude and Fugue in E	Bach.
Organ Concerto, No. 2	Handel.
Marche Romaine	Gounod.
Toccata et Fuga in A minor	Bach.
Organ Concerto, No. 3	Handel.
The "Bride's March"	Loaring.

An organ recital was given on Saturday, September 27th, by Mr. Walter Clough. The programme included:—

Grand Chorus in D major	Guilmant.
Gavotte (Pastorale)	Muscat.
March Triomphale	Clough.
Prelude in E flat major, and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
"The Language of Flowers" ("The Lilac")	Cowen.
March and Chorus, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner.

BOLTON.

An organ recital was given in the Albert Hall, by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., on Saturday, September 29th. The following was the programme:—

Organ Concerto in D major Allegro—Andante—Fuga.	Handel.
Gavotte, "Heimliche Liebe"	Resch.
Variations on the Hymn, "O Sanctissima" ("Sicilian Mariner's Tune")	Lux.
Double Chorus, "The Horse and his Rider"	Handel.
Grand March Triomphale	Mullineux.

OLDHAM.

On Friday, September 28th, organ recitals were given in the Industrial Exhibition by Mr. Alfred Smith. The programmes included:—

Festival March	Dunster.
Melody in A flat	Guilmant.
Chorus, "Fixed in His everlasting seat"	Handel.
Grand Organ Sonata, No. 1 Allegro—Adagio—Andante—Allegro assai vivace.	Mendelssohn.
Andantino	Schubert.
Marche Funèbre et Chant Séraphique	Guilmant.

And by Mr. James Lowe, on the same day:—

Grand Solemn March in E flat	Smart.
Andante in D	Archer.
Cantilène Pastorale	Guilmant.
Grand Sonata in E flat	Buck.
Andante con moto in A	Smart.
Caprice in B flat	Guilmant.
"La Priere"	Thayer.
Brilliant March in E flat	Wely.

WARE.

An organ recital was given on Tuesday, September 25th, by Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., assisted by Mr. Trelawny Cobham. The following was the programme:—

Concertante in C major (1st movement)	Handel.
Recit., "Ye people, rend your hearts" Air, "If with all your hearts" ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn.
Andante con moto in E	Guilmant.
Harvest Thanksgiving March	Calkin.
Meditation on Bach's 1st Prelude	Gounod.
Andante con moto in A	Smart.
Romanza in G, Op. 40	Beethoven.

REIGATE.

An organ recital was given by Mr. J. W. Gritton, F.C.O., at St. Mark's Church, on the occasion of the re-opening of the organ, after enlargement, alterations, and additions by Mr. A. Kirkland, Wakefield. The following was the programme which was admirably executed :—

Andante in A flat	Hoyte.
Andante and Allegro	Bache.
"As pants the hart"	Spohr.
Harvest Thanksgiving March	Calkin.
"Slumber Song"	Gounod.
Allegro in D	Tours.
Sonata, No. 1	Mendelssohn.
Larghetto from Trio in B flat	Mozart.
Marche Religieuse	Guilmant.
Andante from 10th Trio	Reissiger.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor	Bach.

BIRKENHEAD.

A new organ is now in course of erection at St. Michael's Mission Church, Claughton. The organ is being erected by Messrs. Wm. and Frank Hall, organ builders, Birkenhead, and will be formally opened next week. The manuals extend to upper C, thus making the super octave really useful. The Great organ sound-board comes outside the recess of the organ chambers. The organ has two manuals and Pedal. There are 4 Couplers and the same number of composition pedals, balance Swell, perpendicular shutters, upper keyboard projecting, couplers over Swell keyboard.

PRESTON.

On Saturday evening, Sept. 29th, Mr. Tomlinson, organist of the Corporation, gave his usual weekly recital in the New Public Hall, on the grand organ. The programme was as follows :—

Con moto in D minor	Smart.
Fantasia on a Theme of Weber	E. H. Turpin.
Barcarolle	Spohr.
Overture to "La Sirene"	Auber.
Pastorale Symphony, from the "Light of the World"	Sullivan.
Grand March, from "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod.

Mr. Tomlinson rendered the "Fantasia" in a most pleasing manner. The compositions of the composer of this piece are always well received at these recitals. The "Barcarolle" was given in equally good style, and the organist received a well-merited encore, to which he responded. The recital concluded with the Grand March from "La Reine de Saba," played in a very spirited manner. On Thursday, Sept. 27th, at a meeting of the Town Council, Mr. James Tomlinson was re-appointed organist to the Corporation.

BLUNDELLSAND.

Annexed is the programme of an organ recital given at St. Nicholas' Church, on September 26th, by Mr. Fred. H. Burstall, Mus. Bac.

Overture for the Organ	Mudrandk.
Air with variations in A major	Haydn.
Grand Fugue in G major	Krebs.

BELFAST.

An organ recital was given on Tuesday evening, the 18th inst., by Master Alfred Hollins, of the Royal Normal College for the Blind, Upper Norwood, a pupil of Dr. E. J. Hopkins, on the fine organ built by Peter Conacher & Co., Huddersfield, in the Carlisle Memorial Methodist Church. His programme included :—

PART I.

Motet, "Deus Tibi"	Mozart.
Funeral March	Chopin.
Allegretto in B minor } Grand Chœur in D }	Guilmant.
Two short pieces in A and D	Hopkins.
Pastorale Sonata, Op. 80	Rheinberger.

PART II.

Gavotte, "M. Antoinette"
Gavotte, "Air du Dauphin"	Roeckel.
Gavotte in A	Hollins.
Grand Fugue	Bach.
Cantabile and Fanfare	Lemmens.
Prelude, No. 20	Chopin.
"Wedding March"	Mendelssohn.

It will be seen from the above, that great variety was presented. Left alone as he was, and comparatively new to the instrument, loss of sight did not seem to interfere with Master Hollings, and his many beautiful combinations and at all times "clean" playing, showed rare talent. His rendering of Lemmens' lovely cantabile, Guilmant's well-known allegretto and "Grand Chœur" (splendidly played), the last movement of Rheinberger's sonata, and the G minor fugue, are worthy of particular mention. A gavotte of his own composition was also an attractive item. His talented master's graceful pieces in A and D were beautifully played. Altogether the recital was a rare treat, and the youth is to be heartily commended on his really good performance. Several private recitals given here on different instruments have shown more evidence of his skill both as an organist and pianist. The organ is an effective instrument of two manuals and Pedal organ with some 37 stops.

Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which was so successfully performed by the Philharmonic Society last season, will, it is understood, be included in the first concert of Mr. Theodore Thomas's orchestra in the coming season in New York.

Says the Musical Times :—The details of Mr. Mackenzie's new oratorio (to be produced at the Norwich Festival next year) being now settled, and the work considerably advanced, amateurs may feel interested to know some particulars connected therewith. It is called "The Rose of Sharon," and presents in a dramatic form the "argument" of the Song of Solomon. The compiler of the book, Mr. Joseph Bennett, has adopted Ewald's reading of the Hebrew poem—a reading with which Renan substantially agrees—but has permitted himself to take certain liberties with the arrangement of the scenes, showing in action, for example, events that the original simply describes. Mr. Bennett's book is in four parts, respectively entitled "Separation," "Temptation," "Victory," "Reunion," and there are four principal characters—the Sulammite (soprano), a First Attendant (contralto), the Beloved (tenor), and Solomon (bass). The action opens in Lebanon, is then transferred to Jerusalem, and finally returns to the vineyards and cedar groves where it began. Throughout each scene the simple object is to illustrate the moral of the Song of Songs—"Love is strong as death and unconquerable as the grave." The Sulammite is taken by Solomon from her native mountains to Jerusalem, and sees the King "in all his glory." But she remains faithful, her one answer being, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." Strong in this strength she resists, and is at last permitted to return to her village and her vineyard, to be united to him whom her soul loveth. We believe that Mr. Mackenzie finds all his sympathies aroused by the beautiful story, and the no less beautiful Scriptural text.

At Liège recently died Victor Massart, honorary professor of the Conservatoire of that town, a brother of the still better known Jean Lambert Massart, professor of the Paris Conservatoire.

The Melomane, a well conducted Parisian journal recently started, has for its chief concerts well assorted music. It says in its weekly budget of news, that a great novelty is a new opera, "Egmont," by M. Gaston Salvayre.

Another book having Wagner for its subject is printed in Dutch, and written by G. Viotta. "R. Wagner. Zijn leven en zijne werken geschetst," that is, "R. Wagner: A criticism of his life and works" (Amsterdam: Van Dauben in Smeck).

Since the 31st of August, 1833, Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" has, it is stated, been performed at Vienna 403 times; so it is clear that the advanced operatic school has so far been unable to shake the popularity of old favourites.

The four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth is to be celebrated at Geneva by a musical festival. An important feature in the proceedings will be the performance of an oratorio, "Luther at Worms," by Meinardus. This work, written fourteen years ago, has hitherto only existed with the original German words, which have now been ably translated into French by M. A. Köckert, for use at the approaching festival.

Rubinstein has been visiting in Konigsburg at the house of Herr Ernest Wicherts, who supplied the composer with the libretto of his latest work, a comic opera. According to the German papers the opera treats of an exciting episode of Spanish robber life, and Rubinstein has set this to music with appropriate local colouring. The work will probably be produced at the Hamburg Town Theatre for the first time on November 8th, together with the same composer's "Sulamith."

At the Italian Opera, Paris, the conductors will be M. Franco Faccio, MM. Cialdino Cialdini and Luigi Corti. The ballet will consist of twenty-four danseuses chosen from the pupils of the Milan School. The chorus will number seventy-five, and the orchestra will consist of seventy performers. Of works new to Paris are promised: "Simon Boccanegra," by Verdi; "Erodiade," by Massenet; and "Gioconda," by Ponchielli. Among the well-known works of the répertoire are mentioned: "Rigoletto," "Ballo in Maschera," "Ernani," "Puritani," "Martha," "Barbiere," "Nabucco," "Don Juan," "Luisa Miller," "Linda di Chamounix," "Saffo," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Semiramis," "Poliuto," "Maria di Rohan," "Lucia," "Anna Bolena," "Cenerentola," etc.

An experienced married lady has observed that the way to manage a husband is to "feed him and flatter him." This saying has been successfully paraphrased by one who has had experience in the concert-giving world, who says the way to manage an artist is to "fee him and flatter him."

THE CHURCH CONGRESS AND CHURCH MUSIC.

THE annual meeting of clergymen at Reading, this week, is not likely to do much good either theologically or æsthetically. The public press have already pointed out the poverty of the "subjects" on hand, and their inutility to serve any practical purpose. The president will pour forth the usual platitudes of conventional pulpit oratory. Small men will air their crotchets, and be obliged to keep in time. Self-conceited and consequential laymen, may lecture the community at large without convincing a single soul. The readers of this journal are more concerned to inquire what the Congress will do for the improvement of the Church Service, especially the musical part, now so essential. The answer, it is to be feared, must be, nothing.

The subject of Church music does not appear to be down on the list of papers. How is this? Tempora mutantur, within the last thirty years, and many of the clergy are now not only fair musicians, but clever composers of ecclesiastical works. I remember the time when, as a rule, the ablest preachers, the most learned divines, took no interest in Church music at all. Most of them confessed that they had no ear, that they could not "turn a tune." The late Mr. HARNESS, a schoolfellow of Lord BYRON at Harrow and an editor of SHAKESPEARE, was minister of St. Peter's, Regent Square, in 1825 and thereafter. My father, a member of the congregation, often complained of the organist, a poor player, wise in his own conceit; but HARNESS avowed his own incompetence to interfere without exposure of musical ignorance, and asked my father to act as his deputy. Such interference on the part of a "private," however, would have been a breach of etiquette, and nothing was done. Other respectable and erudite ministers rowed in the same boat as poor HARNESS; they knew not one note from another. The services were shorn of all music except the Psalms of DAVID—the abominably bad "Old and New Versions" of STERNHOLD and HOPKINS, TATE and BRADY, sung to tunes good, bad, and indifferent. The prose Psalms of the Prayer Book were read by parson and clerk, in a dreary duet —fideles tacebant! The Canticles and Versicles underwent the same treatment.

At St. Peter's, Regent Square (A.D. 1825—37), the "Kyrie Eleison" after the Ten Commandments in the Communion Service, was spoken by the charity children in the gallery; but after the tenth the organist broke out with a peculiar response, where occurred an unmeaning burst at the passage "in our "hearts," followed by an equally unmeaning "break" before the words, "we beseech Thee."—The "old "Advent" Hymn, "Lo! He comes," horrified all musical ears at the beginning of December; TERRY, the able organist of Hackney Church, positively refused to play it, at the request of the (then) rector, one GOODCHILD, who, by the way, served Mr. HARNESS at Regent Square Church, as curate, and resigned because (he said), "he was tired of playing second fiddle"! Then, as now, poor curates were only allowed to preach to servant-maids and common people. An the afternoon when the notables absented themselves. Even TERRY, although he wrote several capital Canticles for his Church, could or would do no better on such Festivals as Christmas and Easter, than play, for the climax before the sermon, Psalm xcvii. with a "go up" Hallelujah for the charity children at the close. In country Churches, a small band of clarinet, violoncello, and bassoon, accompanied the choir of charity girls and boys.

Nous avons changé tout cela; but musical reformers know nothing of finality; they decline, like Earl RUSSELL, to "rest and be thankful." The Church Congress might have discussed several important questions within the province of ecclesiastical music. The merits, or demerits, of the so-called "Gregorian" system, for example, would have supplied a bonne bouche, or rather a hard nut to crack. The prevalent ignorance on the subject, even amongst professionals, can hardly be thought creditable. The misnomer has been sufficiently exposed, and S. GREGORY dragged down from his eminence. The almost rabid enthusiasm of ultra-Ritualists for the ancient "Modes" strikes moderate men as supremely ridiculous. Without absolutely condemning them, I incline to the opinion of learned professional friends (who might be named) that the Greek "Modes" are really relics of barbarism, in a sense æsthetical, quite out of keeping with the present generally adopted scale, and often positively ugly. The augmented fourth and the flat seventh of the two "Lydians" are not agreeable to ears refined. CHARLES CHILD SPENCER, of Hackney, who wrote an able pamphlet on the "Modes," cried them up to the sky; but SPENCER boasted that he had found a key to the peculiar harmonies required for the accompaniment of ancient scales, and he certainly, in my hearing, produced some good effects on the organ. The "Gregorians," I hold, should be very sparingly used, if tolerated at all. The notion that any sacred or celestial character is attributable to these strains is a matter about which opinions differ.

Other points besides the question of the "Modes" may occur to your readers. The Canticles, too often, are made mediums to show off the composer; they are then styled "Services"—Services in which few of the people can take part, and therefore unsuitable to ordinary "Common Prayer." The "Chant" form ought to be used in Parish Churches. The Psalm-singing varies, after the fashion of the abolished "uses." The Rev. Sir F. GORE OUSELEY, I think, laid down the rules (in a Lecture), that the words going to the "Recitation" note of the Chant ought not to be hurried over, but sung slowly, whereas the following scale passages in minims should be accelerated. The hurrying over referred to sounds irreverent. The same gentleman, or some other eminent authority, has also declared against double chants: they ought always to be single. The Responses after the Commandments sometimes savour of sugar candy secularity; the Hymns still now so. I object to most of the current "Hymnologies," both words and music. The "Hymns Ancient and Modern" hover on the confines of heterodox doctrines, whilst the "Evangelical" manuals, such as KEMBLE'S for instance, are tainted with the unctuous gushing style which unfits them for men and women. Then too many verses are sung, and the congregation kept standing too long in consequence. I have often cut out a few verses from these lengthy Hymns for the benefit of the poor tired sheep. The formula of the clerk, "Let us sing to the praise and glory of God" has been happily abolished, and the clergyman always gives the notice. As regards organ Voluntaries, I am in favour of a short one at the beginning, and a long, elaborate one at the end of the Service. Many of the congregations may be seen sitting in their pews, Sunday after Sunday, until the sweet end of the final Voluntary, when played, on a fine organ, by one of the many excellent musicians that now abound in London and also in the larger provincial towns. Some narrow-minded clergymen dislike an "entrance" Voluntary. I remember that at Regent Square Church, St. Pancras, forty years ago, the organist was allowed a marsh for instrumental play of some eight to ten minutes between Psalms and the first Lesson, so that the overtasked officiating minister, obliged to read the Psalms, might take breath, or perchance retire to his vestry for the refreshment of a glass of water. The Ritualist priest would be aghast at such a license.

A GROUNDLESS ALARM.

The assertion is not unfrequently made that the melodic devices to be formed on the diatonic scale are pretty well nigh exhausted. The young composer may well ask, Is this true? and if true, what are the future resources of the composer seeking to be original? To grant the truth of the assertion is just as damaging to the statement as would be arguments of denial proving the endless expansion of the powers of tune. For if it is asserted that tune is exhausted by reason of the limited powers of the available scale materials it is only logical to concede that this exhaustion must have occurred at a very early date in the history of the art, and indeed would naturally come about in primitive days long antecedent to the days of Plain-song, if not even before the days of Jubal or when the Lydian shepherds piped their flocks together. Indeed, it would seem that this alarming exhaustion of tune, in view of the apparently slender materials tune is made of, must be dated before music, as we know it, came into existence. Well, if this is so, the composer may calm his fears and learn to be indifferent to the from time to time reiterated cry, Tune is exhausted! The truth is this probably, thought is interminable and illimitable, and the means ordained for the expression of thought are as wonderful in their economical adaptability as they are marvellous in their endless powers of thought-suggestiveness and definition of ideality. The subject approaches the mysteries which surround the wondrous scheme of life in production and reproduction. One may examine the question from another point of sight. The cry has not yet been raised which would inform the world that orchestral effects and combinations are exhausted; on the contrary, we are taught to regard instrumentation as a new-born science destined to throw a flood of light upon the other resources of the art. Now, the primary divisions of the orchestral powers are even less in number than are notes of the diatonic scale. Yet orchestral effects are now regarded as exhaustless, just as they were deemed to be before Beethoven wrote; and Wagner, the latest exponent of the myriad functions of the orchestra, is even now accepted as the founder of a new school and not believed to be the last workman in an exhausted mine. The alarmist cry has not yet been raised in this direction, but it would be quite as reasonable to say that the resources of instrumentation are already worked out as it is to assert that Melody is exhausted. The reputed words of Beethoven, himself a most painstaking employer of means, that it was the thoughts lying under the notes and not notes themselves he wanted, point to the direction in which the student may find a solution of this question; for so long as he has thought to express, he will surely find the means for its enunciation more than sufficient. The Creator Himself in limiting the most beautiful of all musical instruments—the human voice—to an average range of some twenty notes, and by ordaining that the principles of tone gravitation shall still more limit all true melodic inspirations, has indeed for once and for all time put an end to the mistrustful doctrine of exhaustion; and the earnest student will find out, as Beethoven said he had found out, that all the great effects in music were—and one may safely add ever will be—clustered together in that marvel of tone eloquence, the diatonic scale. So the composer need not fear to ever have to cry out as regards the sources of melody, Ipsi iam fontes siliunt, for the unseen springs of tune are of everlasting fertility, beauty, and strength.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

Third Series.

XIV.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the conduct of Counterpoint in more than four parts, which will bring my work to a close, I venture to offer a few more thoughts on counterpoint in four parts, the most useful and consequently the most important of all contrapuntal score arrangements.

It seems reasonable to object to the fourth in the preliminary course of two-part counterpoint of the first species, unless in rare instances it may be either taken in passing as a discord—though the assumed length of the notes in most species points against such a proceeding—or else resolved in the usual way. When, however, the fourth appears in three-part counterpoint, modified by the addition of the sixth, it does not seem unreasonable to raise objections against its occasional appearance. The fourth may well appear indeed in such a figure as in the second chord of this passage, with the two upper parts ascending and the lower voice is descending:—

B	C	D	E
G	A	B	C
G	E	D	C

and there are other ways of using the chord six-four, even in three parts. But in a score of four parts there are still more favourable opportunities for the occasional appearance of the second inversion of the common chord without regarding it as an objectionable interloper. An enlargement of the passage just sketched, with the chord twice introduced, will illustrate such a possibility:—

G	A	B	C
D	E	G	G
G	E	D	C

And it will be noticed on trial that the six-four chords in this passage are still less objectionable if a few more five-three and six-three chords follow on. It must be conceded that the fourth to the lower part presents a combination requiring management and discretionary power. Certain it is, moreover, that there has been in all the contrapuntal ages a not altogether unreasonable objection to the use of the six-four chord, and it seems now the time to duly consider and modify the objection. Mersenne, writing two hundred and sixty years ago, has, in his "Harmonie "Universelle," many arguments to prove that the fifth is sweeter than the fourth, and takes pains to show why the fourth is not so good against the bass as the fifth. Then, again, he enters at length in the discussion of the proposition that "the fourth is sterile, that "it engenders nothing good by its multiplication, nor

Digitized by Google

"by its division." It is of course unnecessary to recapitulate the stated rules concerning this combination as given by more recent theorists. The student must neither hastily reject such lines of reasoning, or confine himself too rigidly to rules which exceed in prohibitive force their logical power and explanatory clearness. Perhaps a still more important matter to be considered, and one which modern theorists are still better agreed upon, is the question of the use of the minor mode from the modern point of sight, which calls for a modification of the old contrapuntal assimilation of that scale form to the—from the harmony point of sight—indefinite method of an ancient mode. One way of marking the satisfactory treatment of the modern minor diatonic scale, is the determination to incline at suitable cadence points and other progression to the due recognition of dominant harmonies involving the presence of their major thirds as affording the truest approach to the chord of the tonic. The spirit of sober quaintness which prompts the composer in writing church music and in other contrapuntal uses, to assume an old world, venerable tone-flavour is perhaps to be respected; and this tendency is secured most readily by allowing one's thoughts—especially when employing the minor scale—to drift in the idioms more or less peculiar to the ancient modes. Such a method of thought naturally leads to the, at least partial, exclusion of bran new harmonies and progressions more securely based upon the increased modern knowledge of true harmonic relationship. Such an assumption of old idioms and mannerisms may be based upon a natural inclination to look back through the past ages as well as look forward with hope in all art expressions of religious emotions and religious faith. And as we do not chide our church architects for gathering inspiration from our solemn old cathedrals and churches, we are not at liberty to find fault with our ecclesiastical composers for their parallel tendencies to assume musical mannerisms cast in the mould of grave and antique thought. Such considerations will naturally affect the true use of the minor mode as now generally accepted. Still the student is called upon to learn the truth about the materials he uses, and further to know why he makes use of given forms and mannerisms. Without the imposition of too many restrictions, he should study the different methods of treating passages in the minor mode, whether their inclination be ancient or modern. One useful form of exercise might be that of taking canti fermi in major keys and changing them into minor themes. Such practice would help to clearly show the complete and responsible relationship between the harmonies of the two pillars of both major and minor scales, the chords of the tonic and dominant.

"COUNTERPOINT."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I fear that by writing to congratulate Mr. Stark upon his paper on the teaching of so-called counterpoint, I have involved him in an unwelcome controversy. But it is abundantly evident that Mr. Stark can argue his case ably, and I hope he will not grudge the time.

It was scarcely fair for the writer of the letter in to-day's Musical Standard—especially when writing anonymously—to insinuate that Mr. Stark has been unfolding an untried theory. I have tried all methods of teaching part-writing—or "Counterpoint," if you choose so to call it—and I declare, unhesitatingly, that any successful explanation of its true principles must be based upon modern harmony. It is of the utmost importance that the teacher should show what combinations are suitable for each pattern of writing, and may be sufficiently delineated by the number of parts engaged. No part-writing worth a button could be managed without a full knowledge of dissonance.

I deny that "it is generally believed that the study of strict Counterpoint [than which nothing could be less strict] is the best means to bring out freedom in writing." It would be difficult to find any accomplished musician who would own to such a belief. This controversy has not, so far, disclosed the name of such a man.

The fact is that, although during the last quarter of a century there has been a wonderful increase of power and perspicuity in the teaching of almost every other branch of knowledge, our rules for part-writing are still of the feeblest and most childish description. They do not represent the actual knowledge of any age, however remote and dark; for it does not appear that they ever were obeyed by any musician of higher standing than that astounding genius JOHAN JOSEPH FUX, their renowned sponsor.

We are told that a soldier should be well trained. Certainly! But how? If he is to wield a sword, ought he to be exercised in handling a broom? Just such an absurdity is advocated in schooling our young musicians. They are to be prohibited from using the most effective and puzzling chords during their tutelage, in order that they may effectively and confidently employ them when deprived of all guidance. In order to fit them for the responsibilities of adult life, we are enjoined to seclude them in the nursery, and feed them upon spoon meat. In the worship of the august FUX, they are to be absorbed, till suddenly they emerge as the teachers and guides of an age full of life, and vigour, and animation. To-day they are to see nothing but beauty and grace in Albrechtsberger and Cherubini; to-morrow they will be expected to explain Schumann, to be wrapped up in Brahms, and to adore Wagner.

Mr. Banister sarcastically asked:—Whether we expect to "reform the examiners?" Certainly! that is just what we do expect, and intend to do. With a flood of ridicule we will wash away their nonsense. We are tired of the "progressive conservatism" that is ever conserving, and never progressing.

What a keen and graphic exposition of the absurdity of the position Mr. Banister unconsciously and innocently gave, when he wrote that, "gradually, the feeling and practice of musicians has been increasingly progressive; but the most recent book on Counterpoint is retrogressive so far as rules and restrictions are concerned."

Yours truly,

HENRY HILES.

Manchester, Sept. 22nd, 1883.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Your correspondent, "X. Y. Z" appears to have taken a somewhat peculiar view of my remarks upon the present contrapuntal system, and, as I should be sorry to allow an erroneous impression to exist upon any point raised in the recent discussions, I must ask leave to again trespass on your space. Let me assure "X. Y. Z." that nothing has been farther from my intention than to advocate the abolition of a strict style of Counterpoint for those who are commencing their studies. If your Correspondent will kindly refer to my paper, and to my subsequent letters in your columns, he will find many passages completely exonerating me from such a charge. The art of counterpoint must indeed be taught by first instructing the student in the use of the simplest materials at command, and until he can deal satisfactorily with these elementary combinations, it would be highly injudicious to allow the introduction of anything of a more complicated nature.

My charge against the contrapuntal system is not that it begins by teaching elementary principles—for every well considered system of study must proceed in this manner—but rather that the principles taught are erroneous, and stand self-condemned by the manifest errors and contradictions of the text-books. "X. Y. Z." appears to uphold the present system, but has he the courage to defend its shortcomings? Will he enter upon a defence of the peculiarities noticed in my paper, and afterwards so ably dealt with by Dr. Hiles and Mr. C. E. Stephens? Let him refer again to the letters of those gentlemen who have devoted such an amount of time and attention to the subject as to cause my own small effort to sink into insignificance, and ask himself whether a system founded on such a complication of absurdities is really worth preserving. Let us have strictness by all means, but let us at the same time stipulate for truth. There can be no possible good, but rather absolute harm, in teaching that which is known to be false. As the case stands, I contend that any person entering the lists in opposition to reform is bound, in the first instance, to disprove the charges brought against the accuracy of text-book Counterpoint. If this can be done, well and good, but the fact remains that no ardent devotee of Cherubini or Macfarren has yet attempted the task. I claim, in fact, to have proved my case; indeed, up to the present time there has been nothing said in defence of the existing system.

Let me say, once and for all, that I believe—with your correspondent "X. Y. Z."—that the study of strict Counterpoint "cannot be dispensed with," and further, that I have never advocated its abolition. I do not, however, accept the Counterpoint of text-books or examinations as in any sense an equivalent for the thorough artistic training which every musician must undergo. It is not even satisfactory if considered as an introduction to a higher course of study, seeing that it is in direct conflict with much that a student subsequently learns.

One word as to the adoption of "living melodies" in place of the soulless successions of sounds now generally used. "X. Y. Z." asserts that a "living melody" would be "more difficult for a beginner than the present system." This I entirely deny. Certainly, the mechanical operator, who constructs his exercises after the manner of a sum in simple addition, would be unable to write satisfactory Counterpoint on a genuine melody, either at the beginning or end of his training. He cannot, of course, bring into play a feeling for artistic form, seeing that he does not possess the power of appreciating those beautiful combinations which we know under the term of "melodies." But the true art-worker would find his faculties quickened and developed by a course of contrapuntal study on "living melodies," instead of being dragged down—as he is at present—to the level of the mechanical manufacturer of Counterpoint. "X. Y. Z." doe not, however, appear to claim for text-book Counterpoint that it possesses any "artistic merit" of its own; but only that it may be useful as a "mental training." Accepting this ground of argument, the question then arises: "Is the present system the best mental training that can be provided?" I unhesitatingly affirm that it is not, and I have endeavoured to justify this assertion by the arguments used in my paper, and in the course of this correspondence. To assert that text-book rules—as they now exist—are necessary as a preliminary "mental training," is equivalent to saying that the juvenile game of "noughts and crosses" is an indispensable prelude to the study of arithmetic! "X. Y. Z." speaks of the "constant habit of writing one melody against another in Strict Counterpoint"; but the student never arrives at such a thing as melody in a text-book. Will your correspondent kindly quote eight, or even four bars, of good rhythmical melody from any text-book in existence? It is impossible to do so; unless, indeed the term "melody" is held to bear a totally different meaning from that usually assigned to it. "X. Y. Z." remarks that all our greatest composers have been "great contrapuntists," and such is indeed the case. We can only arrive at a knowledge of the principles on which the great composers have worked by a careful study of the results of their labours. If these principles, when ascertained, are found to be in conflict with the recognized systems of study, so much the worse for the text-book manufacturers.

Your correspondent suggests that I should practise my system on my own pupils, with the object, I presume, of ascertaining whether the result would show an advantage over the ordinary method. Let me point out that work produced by the aid of common-sense rules would be unhesitatingly condemned by the "tie-wig" school, whatever might be its merit from an artistic point of view. In addition to this, the majority of pupils will be found to have some examination in view; and they not unnaturally regard any tuition outside the lines of their text-books as beside the purpose. It is the hardship of the present examination system that no discretion of any kind is allowed to teachers. They are condemned to impart that which they know to be false, and they thus become the unwilling slaves of an absolute despotism.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

HUMPHREY J. STARK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

Sir,—Following up the discussion which has appeared in your paper, on the teaching of Counterpoint, I think it rather a pity that the conversation which took place at the College of Organists, after the reading of Mr. Stark's paper, has not been published. I, for one, feel very sorry that such a paper was ever penned, and I really regret that it was ever inserted in the Musical Standard. I know, for a fact, that this periodical is widely read by young musicians, by men who have lately been under examination, and by others who are about to be.

It is then highly important that nothing should appear (whether written by Mr. Stark or any one else), which is likely to injure our rising generation.

I cannot reply to all that Mr. Stark's paper contains, in one letter, but I will write to-day upon one of the things which has troubled him very much, viz., the chord of eight-six, which is sometimes found on the dominant of the minor key. In speaking of the minor key, we must remember, at the outset, that the Art and Science of music contain many things which have not yet been explained. Indeed, the very existence of the minor key has not yet been satisfactorily accounted for. It is not to be wondered at, then, if we in our research should come across some anomalies. Some years ago, I went through a long course of contrapuntal study. However, after reading lately Professor Macfarren's book on Counterpoint, it seems to me now very strange that Cherubini, Albrechtsberger, and Fuchs should never have pointed out any of the difficulties which the minor key presents. These theorists, and others too, were constantly in the habit of avoiding them. I do not mean by this, that there is no good whatever to be found in their works,—far from that; but, by turning to Albrechtsberger's book (Novello's edit.), and examining Ex. 719, which is professedly in the key of E minor, we find that in a piece of music of fifteen bars, only three of them are in the key of E minor. The same thing may be said of the next example (720), and of a great many others. Surely it was not necessary nor desirable, in so short a piece of music, to modulate at all. Modulation, like all the other good things in this world, should be used, but not abused. It is, in these examples, a sign of weakness, and it is clear that a change of key has been made to avoid the trouble of keeping in the original key. Moreover, it is extremely doubtful if any hearer could fully realise the sense of the key of E minor if the above short pieces were performed. Cherubini does something similar to Albrechtsberger every time he writes a Counterpoint to a minor canto. Mr. H. C. Banister has really produced, in some respects, an admirable Text-book on "Music," and yet he has not given a single example of Counterpoint in a minor key. Sir Frederick Ouseley, in his book, inserts examples from Fuchs in the Dorian mode, which are practically useless to students, now that the old church modes are obsolete. It has always been a wonder to me why these examples should have been given at all. It must be quite evident that there is nothing to be learnt about the minor key from them. Where, then, can I turn to get any instruction in writing Counterpoint to a minor canto? If any one will show me, I shall feel extremely obliged. At the present time I know of no book but the one lately issued by the worthy Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge. He, like the late Alfred Day, seems to me to have probed to the uttermost everything in connection with Harmony and Counterpoint. In consequence of this, the difficulties of the minor key have been manfully met, and a complete list of all the attendant harmonies has been made out.

By going into the matter rather closely, we can soon discover, immensely to the gain of the student, what harmonies every note of the minor scale will bear, and it is very curious that the dominant should give us some trouble. This note gives its own harmony, a major triad, most satisfactorily; but, at the same time, it would appear that it resented any other complete concordant harmony. If we try to write a chord of the 6th, we have a major 3rd and a minor 6th to the bass, and these together are so very discordant, that the combination is not available in strict Counterpoint. Still there is no reason why these same notes may not be used together in Free Counterpoint as Bach has done. In the 10th bar of the Great G minor Fugue, there is the following notable instance:—

The Counterpoint is here in three parts, and at the X there is a chord of the 6th on the dominant.* At this part of the subject, the key of G minor prevails, and this is the way that Bach keeps within his key without using a second inversion. Again, in the 15th bar, 4th beat, there is another similar combination of notes. The key is changed to D minor, and the number of parts increased to four. It is very remarkable that Bach should have made such a persistent use of this chord, but it proves that he knew, in this, as in everything else, what he was doing; and it is quite certain that he preferred this discord to a second inversion.

But I must return to strict Counterpoint, and in our desire to discover new concords for this purpose without changing the

* I wonder how many organ students have stopped at this place to consider what this chord is.

Digitized by Google

key, we find that, besides the true dominant harmony, there is nothing left in the shape of a concord on the dominant, except an isolated 6th. This 6th, with the 8th above it, is the chord which figured eight-six, and although it sounds rather thin, yet it is eminently smooth and pleasant in its effect.

This is the chord which Mr. Stark chooses to laugh at, but he takes good care not to throw any additional light upon this, or any other chord. It is unfortunate that we cannot ask Bach anything; it is also very much to be lamented that he has left us no treatise; but we can, however, appeal again to his imperishable works. I quite agree with Mr. Stark that the works of Bach should form the basis of any satisfactory system of Counterpoint, and I believe that if Bach were asked a question about the above chord, eight-six, he would sanction its use; for I have found it in his works over and over again. By referring again to the G minor Fugue bar, 30, we find the following:—

At the third quaver of this example, marked with a X, here is the identical chord of eight-six, which proves beyond a doubt that Bach preferred the chord in this form to a second inversion. Later on, in this Fugue, there are other instances of the same thing. Had Bach chosen to insert a fourth, it would have been quite easy for him to have done so, but he did not do so, and I fancy it would be AT THE PERIL of any organist to play such a note. As actions speak louder than words, Bach shows that this chord of eight-six had its place in Counterpoint, and that its effect justifies its use.

The example from the 30th bar, as well as the one from the 10th bar, proves that Mr. Stark is in error when he says that this feeling against second inversions finds no place outside text-books.

He is also very severe, and blames Professor Macfarren for mutilating the chord which is figured eight-six; but why does not Mr. Stark blame Bach for doing precisely the same thing? I have thus been led on to write somewhat at length about this chord, and I trust I have been successful in showing that there is no other concordant combination on the dominant of the minor key available for strict Counterpoint, save the true dominant triad before mentioned. I think it manifestly unjust to blame any man for mutilating or robbing this chord; for if only two different concords can be found on the dominant of a minor key, is that anybody's fault? A natural philosopher cannot create anything; he can only treat of such things as he finds in nature. But some people may say, "Why not use a chord of six-four on the dominant? Why?"

I have referred you to one of Bach's grandest compositions, one which is played more now than ever it was since it was composed, and there is not a single second inversion in it. In fact, at the very end (in the last chord but two), where we would most naturally expect a cadential six-four, the fourth from the bass is studiously and most carefully kept out of the chord. It is veritably another eight-six. The reason for this, it seems to me, is that the chord of six-four produces a light, trivial effect, and seriously disturbs the dignity and majesty of good Counterpoint. The old masters felt the same, and thus they considered the fourth from the bass a discord, and required it to be prepared. Bach and Handel, and scores of others, were of the same opinion, as their works incontestably prove. If Mr. Stark had only made a Code of Rules from analysing Bach's works, there would not be such great differences between his (Mr. Stark's) views and those of Professor Macfarren. I do not mean to say that everything found in Bach could be embodied in a book of rules, but those peculiar chords on the dominant given above are to be found in many other of Bach's works, so that it is not a mere whim or caprice on the part of this composer, but a matter of musical faith. Trusting you will pardon the length of this letter, and hoping you will sympathise with me, in my not being able to make it shorter.

I remain, Sir, your humble servant,

X. Y. Z.

The Musical Times is glad to find that Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's cantata "Jason" is steadily making its way among Choral Societies. Its success at the recent Wolverhampton Festival has been recorded, and during the forthcoming season London amateurs will have an opportunity of making the acquaintance of the work, performances being promised by the London Musical Society and the Borough of Hackney Choral Society. Besides these, it will be heard during the winter at Edinburgh, Blackburn, Bishop Auckland, and Bradford.

Passing Events.

"The Reminiscences of an Old Reporter" will be resumed next week; and from time to time.

The Sherborne Abbey Choir, strengthened for the occasion to about 80 voices, and aided by an amateur orchestra, will shortly produce at a concert in aid of the Choir Boys' Endowment Fund, a new cantata, "Nina," composed by the organist of the Abbey, Mr. G. E. Lyle.

A contemporary has it that Mr. James Mitchell, of Coatbridge, near Glasgow, has invented a metronome which, by means of faint and strong ticks, distinguishes pulses from measures. He calls it a "Time Meter," and proposes to bring it out as soon as he has enough subscribers.

A clever and effective operetta, "The Maid of Arcadie," by Mr. C. J. B. Meacham, Mus.Bac., has been given with much success at the St. Alban's Bazaar, Curzon Hall, Birmingham. This striking little musical drama was composed for the occasion.

A really healthy sign of musical enterprise in Bristol is the establishment of Saturday evening concerts, at which oratorios are performed with an orchestra, in Colston Hall, Bristol. No less than two thousand seats are available at threepence each, and the reserved seats are only one shilling.

American papers announce that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will enter on its third season this autumn and winter and will be directed as heretofore by Mr. George Henschel. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and patron of the enterprise, has decided to sell the tickets by auction, rather than in the usual way.

It is stated that the chorus choir of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Boston, U.S., under the direction of Signor Leandro Campanari, is to be increased to eighty voices, and many works of note will be sung during the coming months, Schubert's mass in E flat having been selected for the Christmas Service.

Sir Julius Benedict's "Graziella" has been put on the stage at the Crystal Palace, the composer conducting the first performance on Saturday last. The effect of the music was not on the whole enhanced by the transference of the work to its new locale.

Mr. G. H. Gregory, of the Parish Church at Boston, gave a recital on his fine organ on Wednesday, which will be duly noticed in the Musical Standard presently. The specification of Mr. Scott's smaller organ at the Chapel of Ease, was crowded out on Sept. 29th; it appears to-day under "Organ News."

During last month yellow fever has been causing fearful ravages at Guaymas, in Mexico, and had up to Sept. 17th included in its victims twelve of the members of an opera company. The inhabitants were fleeing from the country. The opera troupe whose ranks were so greatly thinned by the disease only arrived a day or two before the virulent epidemic broke out.

The President of Queen's College, Galway, in his recent annual report, says:—"I am strongly of opinion that the efficiency of our examination would be much increased by considerably enlarging the viva voce part in certain departments, and assigning it a higher value in the aggregate of marks." Dr. Moffett adds, "I am also inclined to think that too much advantage is occasionally given to quickness of writing and readiness in producing knowledge by the number of questions proposed to be answered in a given time. Examination tests memory and power of book-work, as well as rapidity of penmanship, all of which are more or less estimable faculties, but may be possessed in a high degree by persons of very moderate capacity, while they may be far less conspicuous in real workers and thinkers. An examination should not be turned into 'A Great Writing Race,' as Professor De Morgan used to style the examinations at Cambridge." These words deserve the attention of all concerned in musical examinations. To encourage genuine intelligence rather than special cram, and to discover what a candidate does know, rather than to trouble about what he does not know, should be the characteristic method of every examination. It may be questioned, however, whether in art the viva voce system is of the same value as in other departments of knowledge.

One of the curiosities of the Amsterdam Exhibition is an instrument made of 25 large flints, suspended from two parallel rods, and struck by two smaller flints by way of hammers. M. Baudre the inventor, of St. Florent, has spent 30 years in perfecting the instrument, which presents some curious acoustical and tone-producing results.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been preaching earnestly against the selfish, snobbish "dangerous class barriers" now existing. The encouragement of music, the formation of choral societies, and the employment of all talents, especially in the Services of the Church, are to be ranked among the means for drawing the different classes together.

It is stated that there were 195 candidates at the recent music examination of the Society of Arts. Of these all but 13 obtained certificates, 45 being first class, 92 second, and 45 third. Many sol-faists are among the successful candidates. No prizes were given. So large a number of candidates shows the continued determination of our musical people to abide by the reigning inclination towards the examination system.

On Saturday Oct. 13th, the 1st and 2nd parts of Haydn's "Creation" will be performed, under the direction of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus.Bac., at Holy Trinity, Tulse Hill, on the occasion of the annual Harvest Festival. A complete orchestra of about 30 instrumentalists will assist; and the choir will number about 70 voices, including some of Mr. J. Stedman's choir boys. The solos will be undertaken by Mr. J. Stedman, Mr. Robert Poole, and Masters Townsend, Hull, and Wallum. Messrs. W. E. Stark and E. J. Quance will preside at the organ. Mr. Stark's orchestral setting of the Magnificat will be used on this occasion. The Service commences at 7.30 p.m.

The candidates for the position of organist of York Minster, vacant by the resignation of Dr. Monk, are more than 50, of whom several are at present organists of cathedrals or of parochial choirs of much repute. The Dean and Chapter of York have appointed a small committee from their body to examine and report on the testimonials of the several candidates, after which probably about half-a-dozen of the most eligible will be invited to present themselves for individual competition, both as instrumental performers and trainers of choirs, on separate days. The election will take place on the 17th October.

Useful work is being done by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee, who have commenced their new season of work for providing a cheap musical entertainment for the people, and at the same time organising centres of instruction in vocal and instrumental music, and the formation of choral and orchestral classes. Lady Colin Campbell, Miss Ambler, Miss Edith Phillips, Mdme. Frances, Mr. Bartrum, Mr. Prenton, Mdlle. Brousil, and Mr. Aylmer took part in the first concert of the Third Winter Series, which was given at the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell, on Monday last. Two new centres have been organised at Shoreditch and Bermondsey, and musical entertainments will be given throughout the season at these respective town halls. Choral classes will be trained at Clerkenwell, Bermondsey, and St. Giles's. Orchestral classes are likewise being formed at Clerkenwell and Bermondsey. The hon. secretary of the committee is Mrs. Ernest Hart, 38, Wimpole-street; and the hon. musical directors are Mr. Clement Hoey, Mr. Armine Bevan, Mrs. Mallett, and Mrs. Ernest Hart.

The Tewkesbury Register, speaking of the recent Choral Festival at the Abbey there, observes:—One of the most interesting features in this year's Choral Festival is the fine setting of the Canticles, "Magnificat," and "Nunc Dimittis," undertaken very kindly by Dr. Chas. Joseph Frost, at the request of the precentor and the organist. The writer is well-known as an organist of the first rank and a skilful composer of church music, several anthems among other works bearing his name. The "Magnificat" is scored for brass instruments, organ, and drums. There is some most effective unison writing throughout, diversified by verses in harmony, with a theme recurring now and again beautifully marked out. The "Nunc Dimittis" is smooth and melodious in its treatment, while the "Gloria" is similar to that written for the "Magnificat." We heartily thank Dr. Frost for his compositions, and we only wish that they may frequently be heard elsewhere. The pieces were conducted by himself.

"La Vie," altered from Offenbach's opera of 1866, was heard for the first time in London on Oct. 3rd, under the direction of M. Jacobi, at the Avenue Theatre.

The Hackney Choral Society announce a spirited scheme for the season, starting with Mr. E. Prout's "Hereward." That gentleman, as heretofore, will conduct the performances.

Bord's pianos have been awarded the gold medal at the Amsterdam Exhibition and the great merit of the maker, has received deserved recognition at the hands of the President of the French Republic, who, at the recommendation of the Minister of Commerce, has conferred on Mr. Bord the title of Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society have issued their prospectus for the sixth season. The conductor as before will be J. Frederic Bridge, Mus.Doc. Oxon. Sub-conductor, David Beardwell; honorary accompanist, Mrs. C. J. Birch. The energetic and enthusiastic society has already selected for the ensuing season, Mendelssohn's "Athalie," Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," and selections from Weber's "Euryanthe," and Beethoven's "Fidelio."

The London rehearsals for the Leeds Festivals of next week were held during the past week, at St. James's Hall, and fully demonstrated the fine properties and excellent balance of the orchestral forces. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted the practice of Sir G. A. Macfarren's "King David," the composer being present; Raff's oratorio, "The World End," etc. Mr. Cellier directed the rehearsal of his "Gray's Elegy," and Mr. Barnby led the practice of his 97th Psalm. The rehearsals gave promise of a real musical success.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society (conducted by Mr. Barnby) opens its thirteenth season on November 7th with a repetition of Berlioz's "Faust" music, the dates of the other nine concerts being November 28th, December 12th, January 1st and 16th, February 7th and 27th, March 13th, April 2nd and 11th. M. Gounod's oratorio "The Redemption" will be given, in addition to several standard works by classical composers of the past, including Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" in D. A special feature in the prospectus is the promised production of the late Richard Wagner's closing "opera drama" "Parsifal," which will be performed without stage accessories.

QUERY.

MUS.BAC. DEGREE.—Will some kind reader inform me whence I may obtain a list of the requirements for Mus.B. Degree, and also state the names of the text-books necessary for a good study of the subjects for examination?—G. W.

REPLY TO E. R.

"Gallia" is the ancient name of France. The motet gracefully and sadly points to France, as modern Gaul. The composer writing just after the Franco-German war, mourned in this cantata the sorrows of his beloved country.—ED. Mus. Stand.

ORGAN BUILDERS,
WYNDHAM STREET, PLYMOUTH.
London Agency: Mr. W. H. HELE, 59, Gresham St., E.C.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to Organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The chorus struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

"NOTES" OF THE CHURCH CONGRESS AT READING.

(From our own Correspondent).

From a musical point of view there has been far too little of general interest to report in connection with the proceedings of the Church Congress, and, so far as any practical effect upon church music is to be considered, I am afraid the future will unfortunately be quite barren of results from the Reading meeting. If I may be allowed to record my notes of the week it will be seen how meagre has been the musical fare.

To begin at the beginning of Congress week. On Sunday, Sept. 30th, special Choral Services were held in most of the churches, at which the Annual Harvest Festivals were combined with special preachers to mark the opening of the Congress Services, which were continued in the same churches on the Monday evening. On Tuesday morning the opening Services were confined to the three old parish churches in the town—those dedicated respectively to St. Mary the Virgin, St. Giles, and St. Laurence. As the Archbishop of Canterbury was to preach at St. Mary's, that became the most attractive church, and it was filled to overflowing by members of Congress only a very few minutes after the doors were opened. It is a fine old church, with a large four-manual organ by Willis (at which Mr. W. H. Strickland has long ably presided), and this Service seemed to obtain appropriate dignity by the presence of the Mayor and Corporation in state, as well as many of the greater dignitaries of the Church.

Sometime before eleven o'clock Mr. Strickland played some soft voluntaries, commencing with Schubert's Andantino in A flat, No. 2 of "Momens Musicals." As the Mayor and Corporation entered the church the "Old Hundredth" was given out, and by the time the choir and clergy were visible at the west entrance, a fine volume of tone arose from "all the people." Tallis's Festal Responses were used, preceded by the Ely harmonized confession—a modern innovation which, I regret to say, is a sort of Diocesan use in Oxford and Reading. The Psalms and Canticles were chanted to single chants by Jones, Turle, Hayes, etc., and being taken very rapidly by the choir, it was soon apparent that the large congregation meant to have its full share of the singing at its own time, and the consequence was that the choir and organ were usually taking one part of the chant, while the "congregational singing" followed one or two notes after. This was an unfortunate blemish upon the whole service, which might have been avoided by the organist and choir "humouring" the important congregation a little more.

Our critical friend, "Old School," was standing a few paces from my seat, and it was sad to see the wrathful glances which he frequently bestowed both upon the choir and organist, and upon the more vigorous of the worshippers around him. I should not be surprised if another periodical complaint should be already forwarded by him to the Musical Standard.

The anthem was Clarke Whitfeld's "Behold how good and joyful," and it was very well rendered by the voluntary choir, but it did sound rather old-fashioned for the occasion. I could not help mentally contrasting this service with one which I heard in the same church on the previous Friday evening, when, at the Harvest Festival, the choirs of St. Mary, All Saints, and St. Saviour's, were combined with grand effect, and the rendering by the large body of voices of Tours' "Praise God in his Holiness," was strikingly effective. But the admirable sermon of the Archbishop compensated one entirely for any defects in the preceding Service, and the organist "played us out" with a good performance of Beethoven's "Hallelujah," in which the power and resources of Willis's fine organ were fully displayed.

For the Congress meetings a large wooden hall was erected to seat an audience of 3000, while the Town Hall, close at hand, was utilized for the Sectional meetings. As each meeting has been opened and closed by a hymn, the organ of the Town Hall has been regularly used, but in the large Congress Hall only an Estey organ was available, as the Committee declined to reserve sufficient space for an organ to be specially erected. The leading organists of the town—Messrs. Davis, Read, Strickland, and Tirbutt—have alternately given their services at the two halls, but short organ recitals were, of course, only possible at the Town Hall.

I believe it is customary to commence the Congress Meeting with the Apostles' Creed, as well as prayers and hymns, and on Tuesday the recital of the Creed in the Congress Hall, by a crowded gathering of at least 3,000 people, was very impressive. To me it seemed the most convincing argument for congregations saying their responses in monotone rather than speaking them, independently of all time and rhythm. What a "hubbub" would have resulted from such "speaking" in this instance, while the "monotoning" produced a most impressive effect.

I must also mention the wonderfully grand "congregational singing," which I heard at the meeting on Wednesday evening, when the Hall was packed with over 3,000 working men for their especial meeting. The hymns "All people" (Old Hundredth), "O God our help" (St. Ann), and "Glory to Thee" (Tallis's Canon), were sung, as it had not been my lot to hear them before, the sound rolling out in a slow, broad, and dignified unison, which is only possible with sound, majestic tunes, sung by an immense body of men's voices. At such a time one forgot all about sentimental refinement, strict time, and startling contrasts, and only joined with heart and voice in swelling out God's praise in all possible grandeur.

At the meeting in the Town Hall on Thursday evening, the subject of discussion was "The Services of the Church, and their Adaptation to Modern Needs," introduced by papers from the Bishop of Bedford, Canon Medd, Rev. Berdmore Compton, and Mr. Sydney Gedge. Upon this meeting my hopes were centred for something interesting to us church musicians, but, alas! I was disappointed, for only the smallest reference was made to what might have been the most important part of the subject. It seems to me, that the clergy do not realize the influence which music has, or should have, in their church Services, however much they are alive to the importance of the prayers and sermons.

In the course of his paper the Bishop of Bedford truly remarked upon the necessary differences to be observed in services at Mayfair and Bethnal Green respectively, and rightly protested against the continual elaboration of the musical part of the Services, so that they went beyond the understanding of the congregations, and the Rev. Berdmore Compton agreed with him in fearing that the musical services at present were becoming too elaborate. But Mr. Sydney Gedge, who appears to be a very "protestant" layman, simply objected to anything but the most simple musical service, holding up intoning and monotoning by choir and clergy to the very easy ridicule of senseless jokes. Supposing, said Mr. Gedge, that we had an earnest request to make of the prime minister, should we make it more earnest or effective by intoning it? And this idea (very old, by the way) was received with great laughter and applause. But is not such a comparison of our forms of prayer and praise somewhat irreverent, and is it possible to argue effectively against such bigoted intolerance of decent forms as is evinced by such church people as Mr. Gedge and his sympathizers? At any rate no real notice was taken of these remarks in the discussion which followed them, and only Canon George Venables ventured to remark that the Psalms were written for singing, and could not be properly expressed by reading.

The clergy who joined in this discussion devoted all their time to pleading for greater freedom in using and adapting the prayer book, and in increasing the number of Services; but not a suggestion was made as to the power of music in adapting the Services to modern needs; not a voice was raised to advocate the performance of oratorios in churches as a most attractive act of worship; not an attempt was made to explain the meaning and intention of the more elaborate musical Services, which are surely not everywhere inappropriate to modern needs; and, in fact, it was evident that not one of the speakers considered the Service music as at all important in connection with the subject.

Mr. Beresford Hope mentioned (although he did not suppose it had really anything to do with the subject) that the introductory sentences might be set to music, and sung as anthems, and so used to commence the Service instead of the processional hymn to which some objected; and another speaker, a clergyman, thought that there should be no loud organ playing whatever after the Services, but that soft music should be played, while the clergy could go and quietly converse with those who had been affected and brought to repentance by the soul-stirring praying and preaching just concluded! Indeed, the great idea seemed only to make the evening Services mission Services for the poor, and to make as prominent as possible the sad and awful side of religious thought and feeling.

But where were all our musical clergy and our prominent church musicians? How I longed to hear the well-known name announced of someone with a position sufficient to assert his right to be heard in behalf of the musical Services of the church, and their adaptation to modern needs. The hall was full, crowded in fact, with an assemblage of church-goers anxious to hear of something practical, and there was a splendid opportunity for a church musician, either clerical or lay, to explain and plead for the musical service. As it was the idea of "Congregational singing" was narrowed down to the simplest chanting and hymn singing, and a fine opportunity for suggesting some advancing movement was lost. And now we can but hope for something better—far better—from the Congress meeting of Carlisle a year hence!

THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

The preparatory rehearsals were duly, and on the whole, very satisfactorily accomplished. On Wednesday, Oct. 10th, the real work of performance commenced, and the remarkably fine mass of skilled instrumentalists and good, healthy, well-trained Yorkshire voices, very soon demonstrated their strong points and good qualities. London can neither claim a monopoly of good music or the possession of a vested right in dense fogs. The arrival in Leeds on Wednesday morning of the Duke and Duchess of Albany, and their official reception by the corporation, practically opened the festival; but unfortunately the royal couple entered Leeds in a fog fairly to be called dense, and in an atmosphere made all the more miserable by drizzling rain. However, the fine Town Hall, lit up by electricity (which, however, like the elements outside, was not altogether propitious to the interests of the meeting, for the lights at one time approached a failure), presented a nobly animated scene. An audience packed to the very doors, showed the unfading popularity of Mendelssohn's "Elijah"—that finest work, in which voices are used vocally and the best resources of the art are legitimately employed, of the present century,—and a notable performance gave proof that the popularity of "Elijah" is well founded. Costa's dressing of the National Anthem opened the festival, but before proceeding the warm-hearted reception of the chief actors of the week's musical drama, including an enthusiastic greeting for Sir Arthur Sullivan, must be recorded. The fine tone of the band, the equally fine and well-balanced chorus instantly made their mark. The chorus, indeed, more than equalled the high expectations of those who attended the last Leeds Festival, and was, in short, finer than ever. The singing of Madame Valleria proved that the meeting could get on very well, indeed without Madame Albani. Madame Patey sang admirably as she always does; Mr. Maas was most efficient, and Mr. Santley warmed up to one of the finest readings of the prophet yet heard. The choruses were sung with an attack, with a richness of tone, and a living enthusiasm well worth a long journey to hear. The very small number of signs of hesitation or of error, were too trifling to call for a word, only congratulations are to be offered for a superbly fine choral performance. Dr. Spark was the organist, taking the monster organ with a familiar hand. Sir A. Sullivan conducted with complete success. At the evening concert Mr. Cellier's setting of "Gray's Elegy" was produced, this work taking the place of Mr. F. Clay's originally proposed "Sardanapalus." The new work was necessarily written to time, so perhaps is not to be criticised too sharply. It may be questioned whether the selection of the words was one suited to the clever composer's talents. The "Elegy" is one of those efforts of genius which like "Hamlet" in a larger way, has its strength in its appeal to the innate reflective powers of the reader or listener. The soul of the poet is in communion with that of the reader, and the display of imagination and descriptive power is external and only secondary to the greater depths of philosophical, passive thought. It is a question whether such a poem can ever be satisfactorily set—certainly not by the composer, who with facile tune and technical skill approaches his task by wading in a sort of up to the knees prettiness, and has not had either time or perhaps inclination to swim out breast high into the strong tide of deep musical emotions. Mr. Cellier's attempts to regain strength by the use of small imitative realisms, by pretty orchestral devices, is at once directly contrary, if not impertinent to the really deeply contemplative character of the poem. The realisation of the natural and local sounds should rather have been avoided, and the composer practically fell into a trap of his own making. His workmanship is undeniably good, and he has the gift of pleasant, fluent melody; his harmonies are good and well chosen, and his orchestration shows everywhere an experienced hand. The superficial beauties and good qualities of Mr. Cellier's music won for him a sincere congratulation from an audience well disposed to accept and be pleased. The vigorous and well marked chorus, "Let not ambition," proved to be one of the most effective numbers of the work. The solo and chorus, "Full many a gem," and the tenor solo, "Some village Hampden," were among the pieces making a good impression. The soloists were Miss A. Williams, Miss H. Wilson, Messrs. Lloyd and King; these artists sang earnestly and well. The chorus singing was here and there fine, but the display in this department was not equal to the work of the morning concert; neither was the band so much on fire as in the rendering of "Elijah." Mr. Cellier conducted with excellent skill, and was much applauded. The second part of the concert included a good performance of Beethoven's second symphony, the effects of which here and there are, however, better suited to a smaller orchestra. We are indeed in some danger, with our exceptionally large modern orchestras, of doing violence to the more delicate effects of scores originally intended for an orchestra not exceeding sixty players, with all departments properly proportioned. The soloists were Madame Valleria, and Mr. Lloyd. Choral and instrumental pieces were alike well rendered.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

One of the great features of our musical season, will be Mr. W. Rea's Subscription Concerts. At the first of these—on Nov. 21st,—will be given Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," not heard here for some time. The artists engaged for "St. Paul" are Miss Marriott, Miss Palmer, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Brereton. The second concert, on February 11th, 1884, will be a miscellaneous one, and at the third concert, which will take place about the third week of March, 1888, Mr. Rea intends to give Gounod's oratorio, "The Redemption." As this will be the first performance of "The Redemption" in our city, it will doubtless prove to be to music lovers in this district the most interesting concert of the series.

Mr. Rea also intends to give "The Messiah" on December 26th, and "Israel in Egypt" on April 14th, 1884. In all these concerts Mr. Rea's excellent and well-trained choir will assist.

A grand popular concert is announced to take place in the Town Hall on October 19th, in aid of the Organ Fund of St. Dominic Church. Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Powell (violin), and Madame Gould (pianoforte) are among the artists engaged.

Harvest festivals have been the order of the day during the last weeks, and these thanksgiving Services are still performed in our churches, both in Newcastle and its neighbourhood. Beside the special musical Services. The churches have also been tastefully decorated with fruits, flowers, &c.

During next month the Carl Rosa Opera Company will appear here during one week, at the Tyne Theatre (a theatre especially well adapted for large operas—on account of its excellent stage, &c.), when we are promised "Esmeralda," and "Colomba," with Madame Marie Roze as the heroine, in the latter opera. This is indeed good news to lovers of English operatic music, and a welcome change in the usual repertoire of "Maritana," the "Bohemian Girl," etc.

In the musical intelligence from Newcastle, which appeared last Saturday, in the Musical Standard, by misprint, I was made to say—concerning the special chamber music, promoted by Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall—that "the pieces are truly popular," should have been, the prices are truly popular. The programme of this concert has not yet been issued. H. W.

BELFAST CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

On Sept. 6th the annual conversazione in connection with this association was held in the Assembly Hall, May Street. There was a large attendance. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. Thomas H. Browne, T. C., who expressed the pleasure it gave him to see such a large gathering. It was with great pleasure he learned of the additions which had lately been made to the membership of the society. He hoped it would continue to prosper. After referring in eulogistic terms to the conductor of the association, Mr. W. J. Kempton, to whom he said the success of the organization was largely due, he called upon Mr. George H. Scrivenor to read an address to Mr. Kempton from the members.

Mr. Scrivenor then read the following address:—

"Dear Sir,—At the opening of another season we take the opportunity of congratulating you on the success which has hitherto attended your labours in connection with our association, and tendering to you our best thanks for the uniform courtesy, unremitting care, and unfailing kindness we have experienced at your hands. We wish also to express our appreciation of your great musical talent, your unstinted use of which has so much conduced to the better knowledge and cultivation of high-class music; and we bear our testimony to the consummate tact and ability you have invariably exercised in the discharge of your onerous duties as conductor, the exercise of which has led you to be regarded with feelings both of esteem and admiration. We bear in mind the many sacrifices you have made to serve us, and to advance the knowledge and practice of music. We quite recognise how impossible it would be to adequately thank you for all you have done, but we beg you will accept from us the expression of our deep indebtedness, and of the high regard in which we hold you, and, as a souvenir of bygone happy days and pleasing associations, the accompanying bâton. We trust you may long be spared to wield it among us, and that our intercourse together may continue of the same agreeable nature which has up to the present characterised it.—On behalf of the association, we beg to subscribe ourselves, yours, under deep obligation, A. T. Cheyne, hon. secretary; S. W. Mathews, hon. treasurer."

Mr. Kempton made a suitable reply.

A select programme of music was afterwards rendered At the request of the chairman, the choir sang, "Auld Lang Syne," and the proceedings concluded with "God save the Queen."—The Northern Whig.

EXETER.

Exeter churchgoers were treated to a musical novelty on Sept. 29th, on the occasion of the Dedication Festival at the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, built by the late Mr. Gibbs, of Tyntesfield, as a chapel-of-ease for the parish of St. David's. There has been a change of organists during the past 12 months, and the new organist, Mr. W. H. Richmond (late of Dundee Cathedral), resolved to make this year's Dedication Festival unusually bright and attractive, and conceived the idea of engaging a military orchestral band for the evening Service. The idea was adopted, and the result was a crowded church and a highly gratified congregation. A new processional hymn, by Mr. Tuttel, to music written by Dr. Hopkins, especially for this Festival, was used both morning and evening; and among other original music used for the first time were a "Te Deum" and "Jubilate" by Mr. W. H. Richmond, both of which were well sung by the little choir. Mr. Richmond presided at the organ at the morning service, playing with much taste.

In the evening 15 members of the Royal Marine Band, in uniform, were placed in the chancel. They comprised two first violins, two seconds, one viola, two violoncellos, one double bass, two cornets, two horns, two trombones, one euphonium, and two kettledrums, the organ being relied upon to supply the wood and reed elements. The combination proved to be very effective, the only fault being that the brass was too weighty. The service was opened with a cleverly-written prelude for orchestra and organ, in which the composer (Dr. Harding) conducted, and Mr. Richmond played the organ part. The piece was excellently rendered. As in the morning, the processional hymn used was Tuttei's "We march with glad devotion," Dr. Hopkins's inspiriting phrases being enriched by the tasteful accompaniments written for orchestra and organ by Mr. Richmond, who, it may be mentioned here, arranged the whole of the instrumental music with the exception of the prelude and concluding marches. Two of the three proper Psalms were sung to Battishill's Chant, the band joining in the glorias, which were sung in unison against an elaborate instrumental part. In the third Psalm (150th), sung to the Grand Chant, the orchestra was employed, the various instruments being introduced at places where they seemed to be called for by the words. While the 4th and 5th verses (beginning "Praise Him in the cymbals and dances") were being sung, the first violins played an old Hebrew air said to be used at feasts of the Armenian Jews. The Cantate and Deus Misereatur were by Dr. Hopkins. Here Mr. Richmond's ability in instrumentation was well displayed, and again in Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell's anthem, "I have surely built Thee an House," where, indeed, the orchestral part seemed to be richer and better balanced than in the previous items of the Service. Much praise is due to Mr. Richmond for his successful training of the choir, which, with but little extraneous help, performed its part with precision and taste, observing well the various gradations of tone. The tenor solo in the anthem was well sung by Mr. Truscott. There remain to be noticed the hymns sung before and after the sermon. They were three, viz., "We plough the Fields and scatter," "All People that on Earth do dwell," and "Stars of the Morning." The well-known tunes were taken up by the large congregation with really grand and impressive effect. After the sermon Mr. Richmond's "Te Deum" was repeated with organ and band accompaniment. It is an excellent work. While elaborate, joyous, and richly harmonised, it never loses the dignity and devotional feeling which should mark every setting of the grand hymn; and it was heard with evident pleasure. The Triumphal March in "Naaman," and Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March, were played after the Service. Mr. Richmond conducted throughout after the prelude, his seat at the organ being occupied by Mr. Craddock, Mus. B., of Torquay, who played in masterly style.

Horns Assembly Rooms.—The first of a series of six Smoking Concerts took place on Thursday, the 4th inst, at the above Hall, under the direction of Mr. George F. Grover. Though there was not a very large audience present, the concert nevertheless was very much appreciated. A new vocalist at this hall, Mr. H. Seton, sang two songs in admirable style; he possesses a bass voice of splendid quality. Mr. Arthur Reynolds sang with his proverbial "go," which is so much enjoyed at concerts of this description. Mr. Charles Bradberry contributed two violin solos with success, and a solo by Mr. Wilkins's cornet-à-pistons was greatly applauded. Two American organ solos were given by Mr. George F. Grover—the remaining vocalists, Messrs. Bowden, Thornton, and Kersel were fairly successful. Mr. George F. Grover was accompanist throughout the evening. If the remaining five which are to be given, prove equally successful from a musical point of view, those who are partial to this class of music may with safety become subscribers.

Nantwich.—In connection with the Harvest Thanksgiving Services in the Parish Church of Nantwich, on Thursday, the 27th ult. Weber's "Jubilee Cantata" was given as the anthem, with organ and orchestral accompaniments, by the Church Choir, assisted by several ladies and gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood. The work, which is a difficult one, was exceedingly well rendered: the solo parts being sustained in good style by Master Rory Waleen (from Mr. Stedman's choir) of London (treble); Mr. Hitchcock, of Crewe (tenor); and Mr. J. Dunning, of Nantwich Choir (bass). The effective way in which the choruses were sung reflected great credit on the organist of the church, Mr. G. D. Harris, who conducted the performance, and on whom has devolved the training of the choir. The Rev. Hylton Stewart, Precentor of Chester Cathedral, ably presided at the organ.

Leeds Parish Church.—This church was reopened on Wednesday morning, Sept. 26th, after being closed for some months for repairs and alterations. The opening Service consisted of a Service of Blessing, which was conducted by the Bishop of Bedford, who was accompanied by the vicar and curates of the Parish Church. Several of the local clergy were also present in surplices. The "Te Deum" was sung to Gounod in D, and the music to the Holy Communion was Wesley's fine service in F. In the evening the Bishop of Bedford preached to a large congregation, and the anthem was "Awake, Awake," (Stainer). The organ, which has been improved at an expense of £1,600, is now one of the finest church organs in the kingdom. The instrument has some 75 stops and 4,162 pipes.

Belfast.—The conductor and members of the Choral Association may be congratulated on the success of the first popular concert of the season recently given in the Ulster Hall. The building was well filled in every part, and the applause evoked at intervals indicated that the efforts of Mr. Kempton and the committee were fully appreciated. The occasion was the first appearance in the hall of the band of the Inniskilling Fusiliers, under Mr. M'Laren. The manner in which the various selections and accompaniments were played was skilful and judicious. The tendency to loudness, so frequently noticeable where a band comprising the heavier brass instruments is employed indoors, was carefully guarded against. The part songs and glees rendered by the chorus, were well chosen, and served excellently to display the culture of the singers, who promise this winter to sustain their old reputation for refinement and precision. One of the most successful items was "Three Doughtie Men," the humorous part song composed for the association by Mr. W. W. Pearson. The concert, which was under the patronage of Colonel Stokes and officers of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, was an auspicious opening for the season of a society of recognised musical standing.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Sir G. A. Macfarren's address is always looked forward to with interest, and the one delivered on Sept. 29th, as an exposition of the Professor's views on a burning question, will be thought over with marked attention. The following extract will fully display the speaker's ideas anent the question of "the music of the future":—

"Orchestration one might describe as the chemistry of sound—the learning how to balance different qualities of tone so as to produce new effects of sound from their combination. The greatest art of the orchestral writer was to produce such a variety of tone, yet to make for ever the distinctness of its several parts apparent to the hearer. Such they found to be the case in the orchestration of Mozart, who was—and must, he thought, remain—the greatest model for them all. No one had produced more beautiful effects of musical combination than Mozart; but there was never an occasion when one could not distinctly trace by the ear, in performance, the distinct walk in every part of the score, as one could trace it by the eye if one examined the musical construction on paper. In the composer whose name he had mentioned—Wagner—there was not a variety of sound. The same quality of tone prevailed throughout an opera of four hours' length. One had but the variety which was made by striking more forcibly or less forcibly on the pianoforte—of loud and less loud—but the constancy of the same tone of brass and reed instruments prevailed from beginning to end, and with such indistinctness of part writing that when the music had been committed to memory by a listener he could not, in many instances, trace the elements of the score. On that ground he feared that this writer had exercised a bad influence to the musical history of the present, though he would have had no influence but for the genius he had manifested, which he (the speaker) most distinctly wished to acknowledge. The beautiful passages which appeared in the course of his works dazzled them and benumbed the sense for the moment to those large portions which were unequal to them. It was particularly to be desired that they should watch his moments of beauty with circumspection, and in comparison with the writings of other men. Another element of this author's writing was his discarding the principles of musical construction, grounding his practice upon the idea that music was but a portion of the work presented to the public, that it was dependent on the words, that it was dependent on the dramatic action, that it must work together with these to complete the composition presented, and that the trammels, as they were called, of art-forms were fetters to genius, and hindrances to the just development of the musical idea. A work of art without plan, design, or form could not exist. A work of nature presented to us most distinct evidences of plan, design, and form; and art could only emulate nature when it went on principle and when it constructed its productions with this ideal of principle at its very root. Musical design should be built upon the exigencies of the situation that had to be illustrated, but that situation was at the heart of the musical plan, and musical plan might be thoroughly designed, thoroughly fulfilled, if the peculiarities of the text (if it referred but to words), if the dramatic action (if extended over single sentences) were made the groundwork of musical plan.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The inaugural address of the session of Trinity College, London, was delivered on Tuesday, Oct. 2nd, by the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus.B.Oxon. (warden of the College), after the diplomas, certificates, medals, etc., had been distributed to the candidates.

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

At the Social Science Congress at Huddersfield, the Warden of Trinity College, London (Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt) contributed, by request, a paper on the special question, "What constitutes a School of Music; and how far can the formation of an English School be encouraged?" Such a paper from one who has thought much about and done admirable work for musical education, would naturally prove an essay of value and interest, and it will presently be laid before the reader.

Signor Bimboni has gone to Bucharest, there to direct the orchestra of the Theatre Royal. During his stay in the Roumanian capital he will mount an opera of his own, "l'Aidouck," which is written on a national subject. The season at Bucharest will last till the middle of February, and on March 15th an Italian opera season will open at the Vienna Imperial Opera under the musical direction of Signor Bimboni.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

M. Brunel, of Paris, has written an operetta called "Alter Ego."

The people of Berlin propose to erect a monument to Beethoven.

Rendano, the pianist, commences a tour through Italy in November.

Filippo Romagnoli has been nominated a cavalier of the order of the crown of Italy.

Brahms has finished his Third Symphony, which will presently be performed in Berlin.

The death is announced of Carl Kuntze, composer and organist, at the age of sixty-six.

The death of the organist, Signor Cesare Carini, at the age of fifty-seven, is announced from Milan.

A new Spanish opera, "San Francisco de Sena," by Senor Arrietta, has been composed for Madrid.

Signor Meucci has composed a new opera entitled "Annalena," which is to be produced during the present month.

Jules de Swert has finished a four act opera, "Graf Hammerstein," which will probably be given this season in Weimar.

Enrico Piatti, the brother of the distinguished violoncellist, Alfred Piatti, and himself a violoncello player, died recently at Brescia.

The "Walhalla," a new theatre devoted to operetta in Berlin, has mounted a novelty called "Nanon," words and music by Richard Genée.

A new work called "Helianthe," words and music by Adalbert von Goldschmidt, is announced for performance at the Vienna Court Opera during the season.

The monument to be erected to the memory of Weber in his native town, Eutin, will, it is hoped, be inaugurated on December 18th, 1889, the centenary of the composer's birth.

At the funeral of Tourgenieff at St. Petersburg on Oct. 9th, Russian musical societies joined the other artistic, literary and scientific bodies, in paying tribute to the memory of the great novelist.

Signor Alberto Mollini has written an opera, in four acts, "Bocca degli Abbati," the action being of the date of the thirteenth century. Signor Mollini is both a librettist and a composer.

Rubinstein's opera, "Der Haufmann Kalaschnikow," which was for some years interdicted in Russia on political grounds, is now to be heard in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The Russian Emperor personally gave the composer this permission.

Liszt's birthday, October 22nd, will be celebrated in Weimar by a performance of his oratorio, "St. Elizabeth," the composer assisting on the occasion. This summer Liszt has written several pieces, and has twice a week instructed a large number of pupils, about thirty-two.

It is announced that the tenth Middle Rhenish festival is to be held next July at Mayence. Among the chief works given will be the "Triumphlied" of Brahms, one of Schumann's symphonies, the "Faust" overture of Wagner, and Handel's "Messiah." Herr Friedrich Lux will be the conductor.

Forty-four pianoforte trios were sent in to compete for the prizes offered by the Quartet Society of Milan. The work composed by Signor Martucci, of Naples, received the first prize. The second prize was not awarded, as the next work in merit proved to be by a German, and the competition was confined to Italians.

Says the Athenæum:—"A new theatre, the Deutsche Theater, has just been opened in Berlin, at which a plan has been adopted worthy of general imitation. All the performers have resolved that they will not allow any recalls, except on benefit nights, and on the first production of new works. We fear that the recall and encore nuisance has taken too firm a hold of our English public to offer much hope that the excellent example of the Berlin artists will be followed here."

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

On Saturday last Mr. Walter Wesché made a good first appearance as solo organist, handling the instrument with much skill and considerable taste, though showing perhaps a little want of a full and perfect control of the louder passages, possibly in consequence of a slight nervousness. The first solo was an overture in C minor by Himmel, which makes an effective organ piece. Next came Bach's Fugue in D major. Then "Variations Moderne" of the player's own, consisting of seventeen changes upon an original theme. This is a clever and promising work, was well handled by the player, and was duly appreciated by a critical audience. The other organ solos were the andante from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" of Gavotte, by M. Lee, and Flotow's favourite overture to "Stradella." The accomplished violoncellist, Mr. E. Woolhouse, played most artistically Servais's "Concerto Militaire," for which he was recalled, and "Chanson a boire" (Dunckler), which was encored. Mr. George Cox has a good tenor voice of excellent quality, and sang carefully and well. His first song was "Deeper and deeper still." The next was Sullivan's "A maiden sat at her door," which was encored, and then Allen's "Maid of Athens." Mr. Wood was the painstaking accompanist. Mr. W. T. Best is to play next Saturday, and Dr. A. L. Peace will be the soloist on Oct. 27th. Both announcements will give pleasure to the organ world. To-night Mr. Albert E. Bishop will be the organist.

FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

The following organ recitals have been given during the week by Mr. J. Loaring, F.C.O. The programmes included :—

Organ Concerto, No. 3	Handel.
Bell-Rondo	Morandi.
Prelude and Fugue	Bach.
March Cortège from "Irene"	Gounod.
Overture, "Il Turco in Italia"	Rossini.
Organ Concerto, No. 4	Handel.
Prelude and Fugue	Bach.
"Marcia de Processione"	Morandi.

BRISTOL.

An organ recital was given in the Colston Hall on Saturday, October 6th, by Mr. George Riseley. The following was the programme :—

Offertoire, No. 4, in G minor	Batista.
Allegro—Andante—Allegro.
Adagio, 3rd Symphony	Mendelssohn.
Organ Concerto, No. 4, in F	Handel.
Allegro—Andante maestoso—Adagio—Allegro.
Adagio	Beethoven.
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Marche Religieuse	Chauvet.
March, "Tannhauser"	Wagner.

EXETER.

An organ recital was given on Wednesday, September 19th, in the Queen Street United Methodist Free Church, by Mr. Harold Ryder, organist of Southernhay Congregational Church. The following was the programme :—

Overture to "Athalie"	Handel.
Allegro—Grave—Allegro—Adagio.
"Hymn of the Nuns," with variations	Wely.
Larghetto from the Symphony in D	Beethoven.
Concert-stuck	Speth.
Fantasia on the "Vesper Hymn"	E. H. Turpin.
Flute Concerto	Rink.
Præludium et Fuga ("pro organo pleno")	Bach.
Air, with variations, and Finale Fugato	Smart.
Offertoire in E flat major	Batiste.
Sonata, No. 1, in A minor	Mendelssohn.

The organist is reported as playing admirably.

PRESTON.

On Saturday evening, October 6th, Mr. J. Tomlinson, organist of the Corporation, gave his usual weekly recital in the New Public Hall. The programme was as follows :—

Concerto in D minor	Handel.
Larghetto from the 2nd Symphony	Beethoven.
Scherzo	Best.
Airs from the opera, "Stradella"	Flotow.
Serenata	Braga.
"Fanfare Militaire"	Archer.

The andante movement in the concerto in D minor was rendered in a very pleasing manner. "Serenata" (Braga), was, however, the piece of the evening, for the audience received it with loud applause, and were not satisfied until Mr. Tomlinson repeated the whole of it.

The airs from "Stradella," and "Fanfare Militaire" were also well received. The attendance was good.

WORMLEY, HERTS.

An organ recital was given at St. Laurence, on October 9th. Mr. Swift, the organist of the church, presided at the morning and evening services. The programme included :—

Toccata and Fugue in D minor	Bach.
"Austrian Hymn," with variations	Haydn.
Barcarolle	Spohr.
Fugue in E	Bach.
Grand Chœur in D	Guilmant.
Grand Offertoire in D	Batiste.

The organ has two manuals, and Pedal organ, with three couplers, and two composition pedals. The builder is Mr. Speechly, of Camden Town, London.

DUNDEE.

Mr. Horton resumed the series of organ recitals in St. Mark's Church, on Wednesday, Sept. 26th. The vocalists were Miss Winton, and Mr. James Stephen. The programme included :—

"Meditation in a Cathedral"	Silas.
Minuet and Trio	Bennett.
Overture for Organ in E minor	Morandi.
Adagio in B flat	Spohr.
Military March	Beethoven.

MORNINGSIDE, EDINBURGH.

An organ recital was given in the United Presbyterian Chnrch, on Monday, October 8th, by Mr. William Blakeley. The following was the programme :—

Organ Concerto, No. 1	Handel.
Adagio in D major	Mozart.
Prelude and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Aria, "How beautiful are the feet"	Handel.
Pastorale, from the 8th Concerto	Corelli.
Introduction and Fugue in C minor	Gaebler.
Allegretto in G major	Blakeley.
Entr'acte	Gounod.
Overture in F minor	Morandi.

BOSTON.

Mr. G. H. Gregory (the organist) gave a performance at the great church of Boston on October 3rd, when he played, in masterly style, Handel's concerto in A, of four movements ; Sir Michael Costa's "March of Israelites" from "Eli," Batiste's Offertoire in D, Smart's "Song for Tenor," and the final chorus in C, from "The Mount of Olives." This fine organ, which stands in a low gallery over the north transept (approached by a very awkward staircase) was originally built in 1717 by Christian Schmidt (or Smith), nephew of the famous "Father Smith." Its great glory consists of its magnificent diapasons, which, aided by the excellent acoustical properties of the church, produce an effect rarely to be equalled. The organ has been restored and enlarged from time to time ; the last occasion was in 1871, when it was completely re-constructed by Messrs. Brindley and Foster of Sheffield. It now contains forty-one sounding stops, viz. : thirteen on the Great Organ, thirteen on the Swell, eight on the Choir, and seven on the Pedal, besides the usual couplers. Perhaps the most justly admired stops (after the diapasons before mentioned) are the German Flute (by Bishop), the clarinet and bassoon, and the oboe on the Swell organ. One of Smith's original (four feet) stops remains ; it is labelled "Flute-i-Bec," but has nothing very special in its tone, and merely supplies the place of a second Principal on the Great Organ. The Pedal organ is very bold and massive, but suffers from the confined space in which it is placed. The organ, according to Mr. Gregory, is heard to the best advantage about half-way down the lengthy nave.

A small curiosity in Boston Church may be passed over by visitors. This is a monumental tablet at the west-end of the building, to the memory of some unknown individual, with an inscription of the melody of Balfe's song, "Then you'll remember me," from "The Bohemian Girl." The carver, however, like some modern "arrangers" has taken the liberty to change the key D flat to D major.

The project for building a new organ for Canterbury Cathedral hangs fire. Only about £1,200 out of the required £3,500 have been raised. Possibly people are reluctant to give because they believe the revenues of the cathedral are large enough to cover any cost in connection therewith.

BRISBANE.

The first organ recital given in this enterprising centre of a distant colony, took place on July 31st, at the Presbyterian Church. The executants were Madame Mallalieu, (reported to be an admirable pianist as well as an accomplished organ player), Mr. Walter Willmore (an organist well known in London and a member of College of Organists), Mr. Atkinson, and Mr. Scott. One feature of the programme was Merkel's "Duo Sonata," excellently played by Madame Mallalieu and Mr. Willmore. Compositions by Smart, Freyer, Guilmant, and Hiles were also given.

HOPE, DERBYSHIRE.

The Parish Church of Hope has just been enriched by the erection of an excellent organ, by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, of which the following is the Specification :—

GREAT ORGAN. CC TO G.

1. Open Diapason	16 ft.	4. Principal	4 ft.
2. Stopped Diapason	8 „	5. Harmonic Flute	4 „
3. Dulciana	8 „	6. Harmonic Piccolo	2 „

SWELL ORGAN. CC TO G.

7. Violin Diapason	8 ft.	11. Twelfth	3 ft.
8. Lieblich Gedact	8 „	12. Fifteenth	2 „
9. Vox Angelica	8 „	13. Trumpet	8 „
10. Principal	4 „

PEDAL ORGAN. CCC TO F.

14. Sub-Bass ..... 16 ft.

COUPLERS.

15. Swell to Great.	17. Great to Pedal.
16. Swell to Pedal.	18. Great Sub-Octave.

Two composition pedals.

The pedals are straight and concave, the Swell shutters vertical, and the Great to Pedal coupler has a draw knob on either side of the Manauls.

The instrument, which is the gift of W. J. Marrow Esq., of Liverpool, is most effective, the soft stops being particularly well and delicately voiced.

At the request of the vicar, the Rev. H. Buckston, Mr. W. H. Tutt, Mus.Bac., Cantab., L.R.A.M., gave, on the 18th inst., a recital, of which the following is the programme :—

Andante and Allegro	Bach.
Larghetto from clarinet quintet, Op. 108	Mozart.
Fugue in E minor	Bach.
Largo from string quartet	Haydn.
Offertoire in G minor	Wely.
Two slow movements, from violin duets	Spohr.
March	Rowber.
Andante	Wely.
"Hallelujah" ("Messiah")	Handel.

BEVERLEY MINSTER ORGAN.

The fine old instrument in Beverley Minster, built originally by Snetzler, is now being re-constructed and enlarged by Messrs. W. Hill and Son. The old pipes will be carefully preserved, intact, and used again, but entirely new action of all kinds, on the most scientific principles, will be provided, and the organ will be blown by hydraulic power. The present instrument stands in the nave, but the newly constructed one will be arranged partly on the choir screen, and partly at the southern extremity of the same, in the choir aisle, where will be placed the 32 ft. Pedal and other pipes. Tubular pneumatic apparatus will be used for much of both the key and drawstop action. The following is the scheme, as being carried out :—

GREAT ORGAN. CC TO A.

1. Bourdon	16 ft.	8. Wald Flute	4 ft.
2. Open Diapason	8 „	9. Twelfth	3 „
3. Open Diapason	8 „	10. Fifteenth	2 „
4. Open Diapason	8 „	11. Sesquialtera (3 ranks)
5. Gamba	8 „	12. Mixture (4 ranks)
6. Stopped Diapason	8 „	13. Posaune	8 „
7. Principal	4 „	14. Clarion	4 „

CHOIR ORGAN. CC TO A.

15. Open Diapason	8 ft.	20. Flute	4 ft.
16. Dulciana	8 „	21. Fifteenth	2 „
17. Stopped Diapason	8 „	22. Sesquialtera (3 ranks)
18. Clarabella	8 „	23. Cremona	8 „
19. Principal	4 „

SWELL ORGAN. CC TO A.

24. Bourdon	16 ft.	31. Oboe	8 „
25. Open Diapason	8 „	32. Trumpet	8 „
26. Stopped Diapason	8 „	33. Vox Humana	8 „
27. Principal	4 „	34. Clarion	4 „
28. Fifteenth	2 „	35. Tuba Mirabilis	16 „
29. Sesquialtera (4 ranks)		36. Tuba Mirabilis	8 „
30. Horn	8 „

PEDAL ORGAN. CCCC TO F.

37. Double Open Diap.	32 ft.	40. Violoncello	8 ft.
38. Open Diapason	16 „	41. Trombone	16 „
39. Violone	16 „

COUPLERS.

42. Swell to Great.	46. Great to Pedal.
43. Swell to Choir.	47. Choir to Pedal.
44. Swell to Pedal.	48. Choir to Great.
45. Swell Octave.	49. Tremulant.

The two Tuba stops are novelties, and are taken from those made many years ago for York Minster, by Messrs. Hill, the original inventors of the heavy pressure reed, the first ever made being still in the large instrument in the Town Hall, at Birmingham. The present Swell by Snetzler goes only to tenor C.

CHURCH MUSIC AND CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

It is well that we should distinctly recognize the difference between secular music and that which is specially intended for the service of God.

"The intent of singing is by a musical pronunciation of affecting truth, to render it still more affecting." To accomplish this end the music ought, at all events, to be adapted to the sentiments. As in speaking, the sound or modulation of the voice conveys to us the sentiment the speaker wishes; so, to a great extent in singing, there are certain tones which are naturally expressive of joy, sorrow, indignation, &c., and the grand art of psalmody consists in applying these to the sentiments of the various hymns. Ordinary music provides only a high intellectual enjoyment, whilst church music is an offering dictated to God, and as such must be redolent of the incense of worship and adoration.

It has sometimes been argued, that, because a congregation sings a certain tune with evident enjoyment, the tune must be good. Such an argument would hold good if personal enjoyment were the end and aim of church music. But it entirely falls to the ground if we proceed on the principle that the singing of every hymn is an act of worship. Our method as a rule is not good. It frequently happens that someone who has a taste for music composes a tune, a mere tune, without any sentiments to be expressed. The poet then, instead of going before the musician, comes after him; and a hymn is conformed to the tune, instead of a tune to the hymn. The tune being composed to four, six, or eight lines, is applied to any hymn that is written in these respective measures, and repeated over, without any regard to the meaning, as many times as there stanzas to be sung.

There is no need to object to the division of music into parts or breaks, so as to make proper places for pausing; but this division ought not to be uniform, but governed to some extent by the matter to be sung. There ought to be no pauses in music, any more than in speaking, save at the conclusion of a sentence, or of some lesser break in the division of it; and the length of the pause ought to be governed by the meaning, in some proportion as it is in reading. Nothing can be more unnatural than for a congregation to dwell in a long swelling sound upon such words as in, and, from, &c., while they skip over words expressive of the very burden of the hymn, as if they were of no account; yet this will frequently be the case, if we make hymns to tunes instead of tunes to hymns. It would be difficult to find a better definition of a good hymn tune than Mr. Barnby's, and I make no apology for quoting it in full. "The true test of a hymn tune is that it shall equally satisfy the worshipper, a better musician or amateur. It should be capable of embodying the purest thoughts and noblest aspirations of both religion and art. But if, after a fair trial, it fails, through its too great severity, to stimulate the best f elings of the amateur, or if it offend the susceptibilities of the musician, by an excess of laxity, it is surely unfit for its high purpose,"

SIGNS OF MISTAKEN CLANSHIP.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN has gained a musical degree. Very great credit is due to this young gentleman, therefore; but the circumstance is not so remarkable in these days as to call for special notice. However, this really talented and musically well-informed artist has thought fit to make an observation, which seems to call for some comments. He has attributed the criticisms of the London press regarding certain recently-heard new music, the composition of a distinguished musical graduate, to what he is pleased to consider the persistent prejudices against and consequently vindictive onslaughts upon those martyrs of culture, the gentlemen holding degrees, by the wild Indians of the press in that wicked, presumptuous, ostentatious, and stony-hearted place, London, who practise predatory warfare with that dreadful weapon, the pen. Those who know the world of science, literature, and art, know well enough that there is no truth whatever in the allegation of the young musical graduate. However, the young gentleman holds to his own opinion; it is useless therefore to bring forward any testimony to the contrary, and one is inclined to quote the caustic words, Plus negabit unus quam credent centum philosophi probaverint in centum annis. Now, no importance whatever is to be attached to this matter in itself; still it is an incident which shows the want in a certain direction of a little breezy common sense; just as does the absurd story of a musical doctor who was so impressed with the dignity of his position as a holder of the awe-striking diploma, that he was constrained to decline to be introduced to those benighted musicians of this happy land who have neglected to become musical graduates, and very likely he would add also, to those artists who like M. Gounod, M. Ambroise Thomas, and Signor Verdi, &c., have had the misfortune to be born in lands where the effulgence of the glory of musical graduateship is unknown. This story should not be told without the witty comment of a celebrated musician, who observed "The doctor evidently wants to reduce all of us to one level." But it is not fair to cite such palpable cases of weakness, for the many distinguished artists and estimable men who hold University diplomas would themselves be the first to condemn this new form of British snobbishness. Personally I feel pained to be constrained to write about this matter, and only a sense of duty compels me to notice the subject. It is important to point out the necessity there is for doing all possible honour to those who have earnestly and honestly achieved the distinction of winning such very honourable degrees. And to urge all young men entering the profession that it has indeed become absolutely necessary for their future due recognition and welfare, that they prepare themselves duly to pass the Examinations held at our Universities and at such incorporated or chartered institutions as the Royal Academy of Music, the College of Organists, Trinity College London, and the Royal College of Music, to name them in the order of seniority. All the same, it should be borne in mind that this is a transition age, and that it will be time enough for the next generation to talk about the necessary universality of musical graduateship, and to devise special titles of honour to take the place of the titles which are very properly becoming merely the means of duly registering with attainable high credit the names of their holders as qualified members of the musical profession. And it must be remembered that the highest of these diplomas have been given honoris causâ to most of our eminent musicians holding them, as in the cases of Sterndale Bennett, G. A. Macfarren, E. J. Hopkins, Arthur Sullivan, Villiers Stanford, Oakeley, G. C. Martin, &c. Further, no man in his senses could suppose it to be necessary for the distinguished musicians not holding such high diplomas to begin life again by throwing themselves into the crowd of young aspirants, who are now with true sense of self-respect and with a high sense of the dignity of their art, preparing to take their degrees and diplomas by examination. Further, in the name of common sense, where are the tribunals before which such gifted, influential and highly cultured men as, in the field of composition Henry Smart, J. Hatton, G. A. Osborne, C. E. Stephens, Ebenezer Prout, W. Macfarren, Joseph Barnby, Henry Gadsby, Cowen, Mackenzie, T. Wingham, and A. Goring Thomas,—such poetical, powerful, and critical writers and teachers as Joseph Bennett, J. Davison, Henry C. Banister, H. J. Lincoln, C. A. Barry, W. H. Cummings, and H. F. Frost,—such a standard organ player and composer for the instrument as W. T. Best, and such a typical performer as J. Carrodus, can be called upon to display their varied and eminent qualifications? These, indeed, have been leaders in the van of the musical army which has once more uplifted musical England, and raised the position of the musical graduate into one of universal respect and substantial dignity. These men, forming an unequalled phalanx of English musical strength, are working side by side with such distinguished musical graduates as those previously named and as F. A. Gore Ouseley, R. Stewart, J. Stainer, Jas. Higgs, W. A. Barrett, G. M. Garrett, J. F. Bridge, C. Steggall, F. E. Gladstone, H. Hiles, W. Parratt, and others who have well earned their academical honours, for the advancement of the art and for the welfare of its professors. For the benefit of the young musical graduate, now taken to task, and as a protest against any injurious, uncalled for and mistaken clamship, it may be well to repeat what has been pointed out by abler writers than myself, that, granting the dignity and power of Oxford and Cambridge, and duly recognising the important functions our grand and noble universities exercise in the academical preparation of the athletes of the intellectual and artistic world, London must, from its pre-eminent position as a scientific, intellectual, political, and artistic centre, remain the arbiter of British merits and skill. It is the place for men of tried and proved strength; and its vastness has reflected a largeness of mind, a capacity for true and generous criticism, and a sense of responsibility upon most of the men who have risen to do work for the world, far above the petty, schoolboy notions which prompt such nonsense as the weak dictum of one who supposed that musical graduates, well able to hold their own high positions, were being sat upon by the London press, because forsooth they are honourable scholars. There always will be doctors and doctors, men and men; but let those earnestly interested in the advance of the art learn to see clearly despite the clouds of ignorance and prejudice; and learn too that those soldiers of the artistic army who have in their long experience acquired the power of distinguishing good work from bad, are ever the first to rejoice in new found treasures from whatever mine they may be brought to light.

PURPOSE IN THE COMPOSITION OF MUSIC.

III.

Without any rhetorical exaggeration, it may be asserted that the presence of purpose as well as character in their music has been the chief source of the individual reputations of the great masters. The determined definiteness of the yearnings for dramatic effects, which characterised the labours of Monteverde, Lulli and Henry Purcell, furnished the seeds from which sprang modern opera—purpose, as is usually the case, making history. The different idiosyncrasies of Bach and Handel will ever live in their distinct methods and ideas of purpose in music; and the comparison of their labours or achieved purposes have frequently furnished the writer on music with abundant subject matter for consideration. Even the distinct types of the men's lives told upon their work. Thus, we find in Bach the retired, conscientious artist, who could exercise an infinite amount of painstaking without any desire for immediate recognition or reward. On the other hand, note the resolute struggles and restless determination of Handel to succeed from the worldly point of sight. So the one composer gives to the world thoughts overwhelmingly rich in contrapuntal power and only to be fully accepted after generations of art progress; whilst the other turns counterpoint to a more immediately practical result, combining it with such clear rhythmical outlines and striking, nervous harmony, as at once to secure popular respect, recognition, and due reward. To examine the various methods of the great masters would perhaps be a needless task, though I will venture to remind the student of the impression of Haydn's clear-sighted orderly mind, and the consequent gain to the departments of proportion in form and appriateness in orchestration arising from his exercise of purpose in music. Similarly one could point to the delicate, sensitive thought evolutions and exquisite finish which Mozart impressed upon all his work; making it the most perfect study in the way of placing the right idea in the right place, and in the direction of perfectly proportioned construction; here, again, is the exaltation of purpose in music. Then, again, no composer ever stamped the genius of purpose more definitely upon his work than did Beethoven. This power enabled him to create atmosphere in music, as in the persistent figures of the Pastoral Symphony, in which by gentle monotony and by harmonies deeply and strongly laid out upon Nature's own purest harmonics, he wafts the tired brain into thoughts of the silence which is refreshment itself because it is never silent, into dreams of sunny green meadows, waving corn, clear skies accompanied by the delicious humming of birds and insects. Again, see the master with another purpose, worked out with a giant's will. Listen to that tone manifestation of magnificent self-will the Fifth Symphony. Hear the stern, strong accents of the first movement with the rugged unisons, and the unflinching clashing in seconds and fourths of the brass and drums against the stalwart unison of the other orchestral masses, chords which no other man hardly ever dared to use without preparation and resolution. Note the exultant determination of the horns and trumpets in the slow movement. Observe the varied, yet determined accents of the Scherzo and the almost appalling energy and almost savage yet well controlled self-will of the Finale! Here we have a truly magnificent exemplification of purpose in music. Here we find purpose exalted into a distinct principle which pervades, I had nearly said overrides, the music itself.

TONE versus COLOUR.

The subject of identity of effect between sound and colour has again cropped up, in the Standard this time. The now ancient story of the blind man comparing the sound of the trumpet to scarlet, has been brought forward, and a corresponding incident, that of a deaf girl making a similar comparison, has also appeared. These comparisons point to the real source of similarity. For as pointed out elsewhere in these columns, in a review of Mr. F. Hughes's new work on the subject, colour on a picture is neither form or design, but an accompanying quality by which form and design are made apparent. So in music, colour refers to the quality of the tones engaged in the act of enunciating melodic and harmonic figures and designs. However, the desire to compare scale and chord structures with colour effects prevails with an earnestness of purpose which will either lead to the establishment of some fixed principles of comparison, or will demonstrate the fixed and ingenious obstinacy of a certain class of speculative theorists. The Rev. A. P. Bethell, a Priest of the Roman Catholic Church, has a long letter in the issue of the paper previously named, of Saturday last, in which are the following passages:—

"It is now more than sixteen years since I invented "for my own use a system of Scale-colour, or, as I prefer "to call it, Colour Music, so perhaps a few words from "me may prove of interest to some of your corre-"spondents.

"I doubt very much whether the science of optics can "as yet assist us much in establishing an exact correla-"tion between the notes of music and the hues of colour, "and therefore I have not approached the subject from "the scientific side. The view with which I started was "more psychological. I asked myself the question why "are musical sounds capable of suggesting to the mind "ideas of a much higher order, or, in other words, how "is it that they speak a language in which they merely "act the part of signs, like the letters I am writing on "this paper? The only answer I could find to this "question came in the shape of a conviction that the "mind attaches a transcendental value to its comparison "of the intervals between musical notes, dependent "partly on their relative magnitudes, and partly also on "the agreeable physical effects produced on the ear by "concords.

"In 1879 I happened to find a musical passage in "Macfarren's 'Lectures on Harmony' (page 14), taken "from Beethoven's quartet in A minor, which is given as "a specimen of the ancient Lydian mode, and is un-"doubtedly to be considered, as Dryden has it—

'Softly sweet in Lydian measure.'

"I therefore translated the passage into colour, according "to the dictates of my diagram, and was surprised to find "the result, in the opinion of everyone who has seen it, "undeniably 'soft and sweet.' I hope soon to publish in

Digitized by Google

"some magazine such a sketch of my system as will "enable artists to form some opinion upon it.

"I am little concerned with absolute pitch, and there- "fore not disposed to enter into a controversy with Mr. "Foxell as to the correctness of my correlative in colour "for the note G flat. Of course it must vary with the "pitch of the standard A, and also with the key in "which it is taken. But if, as I assume, Schönfield's "'Rosa Krapp' may be taken as the proper representa- "tive of Mozart's A, then, reckoning downwards by fifths "to G flat as the tonic of its key, 'Chalons Brown' is the "colour which I should propose as the equivalent of "Mozart's tonic G flat.

"The chief advantage to be derived by artists from a "system of colour-music depends, however, in my "opinion, upon their recognising the truth that the "value of any colour in a picture is determined by its "surroundings, and I think it will be found that the "musical system is the only one which will give any "trustworthy guide to the results which may be expected "from different combinations. To take a simple illus- "tration—if yellow be used as the third of a major "chord (i.e., in my system, with azure as its root, and "scarlet as the fifth), it will bear out brilliantly and "forcibly, but if taken as the third of a minor chord "(with blue as its root and red as the fifth) it must "needs be somewhat sad and subdued. I am quite "ready to let any artist paint up a scarlet coat to the "extreme of brilliancy, and then undertake to subdue it "simply by painting on other portions of the figure the "colours necessary to make it count as the third of a "minor chord, or by reckoning it as a fifth of a major "chord, and adding to it the root and the third. For "the accent is always attracted by the third, whether "for joy or for sadness, and the fifth is nothing but a "make-weight, which can never be accented by any bril- "liancy of the pigment used for it. I am making experi- "ments at present to determine the corresponding values "of colours when used as sevenths and ninths; and as I "am never satisfied till I have gone all round the circle, "taking at least twelve colours, and finding the same "result with each, it is obvious that I must have some "reason to remember the saying, 'Ars longa, vita brevis.' "Perhaps it may be as well to give roughly my equiva- "lent for musical notes, which run thus: Red, A; "Crimson, B flat; Purple, B; Mauve, C; Azure, C sharp; "Blue, D; Deep Green, E flat; Green, E; Yellow, F; "Buff, F sharp; Orange, G; and Scarlet, A flat. The "seven naturals are what are usually called the seven "colours of the spectrum, viz.: Red, Purple, Mauve (or "Indigo), Blue, Green, Yellow, and Orange. There is a "difference of tone between my Mauve and the Indigo "of the spectrum, but I think experience justifies me in "making it. Violet Carmine may be taken as the repre- "sentative of Mauve, although the aniline colour is often "required in painting costumes, &c. The others may "be taken roughly thus: Red, Rosa Krapp; Crimson, "Magenta; Purple, Dahlia Carmine; Azure, New Blue, "Blue, Ceruleum; Deep Green, Viridian; Green, Schön- "field's Hill-grün Zinnöber; Yellow, Italian Pink; "Buff, Chalons Brown; Orange, Reeve's Pure Orange; "Scarlet, Orange Scarlet Madder. In each case I only "indicate the hues, which may be darkened or lightened "as required, but are subject to alteration in different "keys."

These definitions differ entirely from those given by Mr. F. HUGHES. Certain of the statements herein made, such as the writer's estimate of the position of the fifth in the chord, show to the musician that these speculations are, at least, open to question. Every intelligent mind inherits that glow of delight which attends the intimation or actual discovery of some one or more of the wonderful affinities of the universe, a glow of feeling which is in its recognition of the systematic power shown in the CREATOR'S works, a truly religious impulse as well as a glimpse of that power of apprehension which uplifts man into the regions of infinite life. So the eagerness with which such speculative knowledge is pursued, does not always correspond with the real amount of light the investigator is able to throw upon his subject. Still the present discussion is one of interest. And it has at least as evidence of the importance of its nature, such facts as the inherent tendency of music to shape itself into fixed scales, to select modes presumably appropriate to the expression of given ideas by temperament, or pitch, or both, and above all the clustering together of closely related harmonic strata in all intelligible and accepted tone progressions.

HYMNOLOGY.

Mr. Gladstone has lately translated in the Nineteenth Century, Cowper's Hymn, "Hark! My soul, it is the Lord" into Italian. The Daily Telegraph improves upon the incident, and in an article of interest observes:—

"The power of the hymn was recognized by so celebrated a divine as St. Augustine, who said:—'One feels that song softens the heart, and makes pious emotions rise in it. Words when sung, speech when kindled by music, lay hold of the mind more powerfully than oratory; and therefore it was that the ancient Eastern custom to sing hymns and anthems in churches in order to tune the hearts to devotion had been introduced into the Western Church also at the time of Ambrose.' From that day to this the hymn revival has been steadily progressing. No Catholic service in Germany is complete without its hymn in the vernacular; and in English Catholic churches, throughout the land, translations of the best-known Latin hymns, as well as the modern religious poetry of singers like Faber and others, occupy their appointed place in the ordinary services of the Sunday and week-day. Indeed, the most popular of all Roman Catholic services in this country are those which adopt the German custom of singing hymns in all but the most solemn and silent portions of the mass. In a paper read before the Social Science Congress of 1881 at Dublin, Sir Robert Stewart made pointed allusion to this revival. 'Among the Catholics,' he said "the effort to purify and improve the music of the sanctuary made within the short space of 15 years is more remarkable than any. By one bold move of a musical priest, the Rev. Franz Witt, of Lower Bavaria—a move fortified by the sanction of the highest ecclesiastical authorities—they have established Cecilian Societies, similar to those founded in the year 1868 on the continent and in the United States of America, whose object it is to remove from their services the florid church music known and practised from the eighteenth century down to quite a recent period, and to replace these scarcely veiled opera strains which once deformed their worship by the purest forms of Gregorian or music of a similar type, which, even if polyphonic, shall be of the highest class of its school, and must be marked by sobriety as well as by grandeur.'

"It is not in Anglican or Evangelican services alone that we find the power and purpose of the hymn revival. We may step into a High church and find the congregation uplifting their hearts and voices to the stirring strains of 'Jerusalem the Golden,' or "Abide with Me, fast falls the Eventide,' or 'Sun of my Soul, Thou Saviour dear.' We may repair to a Low church and discover just as much energy and emotion bestowed on the 'Old Hundredth' or the good old 'Evening Hymn,' or even the unmetrical strains of Tate and Brady; but it is rather to the unorthodox churches that we must look to find the power of the hymn and the excitement of unison singing as an incentive to popular religion.

"The mere fact of singing collectively exerts a great power of attraction over persons of all kinds who have tunable voices and are susceptible of the graver emotions. Their human needs should be satisfied in the best and simplest way."

Says the Lute: Italian opera may be going down in England, but it seems to be going up elsewhere. As our readers know, a house will soon be ready for it in Paris, and we learn that Signor Bimbino was to open a month's campaign in Berlin during September. It will be curious to note now "Semiramide" and "Othello" are received in the German capital at this time of day.

Harmonies of Tones and Colours developed by Evolution. F. J. Hughes. (Marcus Ward & Co., Chandos Street.)—This large and handsomely got up book deals with a subject science can hardly be said, as yet, to have fairly examined. Under the warmth of his delight in the discovery of—or rather under the impression of sundry suggested—analogies, the author writes with a glow of enthusiasm which is catching. And throughout the work there is an edifying belief in the Creator's unity of purpose in the government of all things by laws which are universal, and a keen pleasure in the contemplation of natural and artistic wonders, which make the book pleasant reading. But the work is, for the most part, too purely of a speculative type, though the author has evidently read pretty extensively a goodly number of metaphysical and scientific works in the course of some fifty years' experience. The style of his writing may be seen by a few quotations. In his introduction he observes—

The following scheme endeavours to show that the development of the musical gamut and the colours of the rainbow are regulated by the same laws. I wish it to be clearly understood that I have gained the evolutions from the mysterious type of Life—a golden thread running throughout the Scriptures.

Again he observes—

It is my firm belief that if a powerful intellect takes up the radical idea contained in the following pages it will be found to be the directing force or general key-note which will gradually disentangle intricacies in all the natural sciences, and link, by the same mode of physical evolution, the past, the present, and the future.

Such writing lacks logical clearness. Then, again, the following words have in them a flavour of musical empiricism, or, at any rate, a groping about things commonly understood in connection with musical theory. Says Mr. Hughes—

I wrote down the development of the seven major keys of the white notes in keyed instruments. I was perplexed by the movement as of "to and fro," but the development of numbers explained this point, and I found that the method of development in colours, tones, and numbers agreed. I remembered the keys with sharps, but had forgotten that B flat belonged to the key of F, and here I thought that the laws failed. But I found, by reference, that all were correct, the eighth being the first of a higher series, the laws having enabled me to distinguish between sharps and flats, whether veering round or advancing and retreating in musical clef.

And—

I had forgotten all the minor keys, except that A is the relative minor of C major; but although I had only faint hopes of success, I determined to try, and I gained the twelve keys correctly, with the thirteenth octave. I found also that E flat was usually printed as a minor key-note, Nature's laws having shown that it must be D sharp.

These are words of a more definite import—

As knowledge increases, may not the beginning of every physical science be traced first as a trinity, springing from a trinity in unity, followed by a second, partaking of the nature of the first, so as to unite with it in complementary pairs, as here described, in tones and colours, trinity in unity being the germ of never-ending developments?

Also the following—

The inequality of the equinoctial points is a well-known fact. It will be seen how apparent this is in the development of harmonies. From the moment that trinities depart from unity the balance is unequal, and the repeated endeavours after closer union cause a perpetual restlessness.

This is a sample of the author's speculative manner of dealing with the theory of musical scale system and its adjacent harmonies—

On a keyed instrument only twelve are major key-notes, but as the double tones C sharp-D flat and F sharp-G flat are roots, there are fourteen different chords. As an example of the major chords in the different keys, we may examine those in the key of C. A major fifth includes five out of the seven of its key; with the third or central note it is the threefold chord, or four-fold when the octave note is added. Including the silent key-notes, a threefold chord embraces eight, or, counting the double tones, not including E sharp, eleven. The first and second chords of the seven of the harmony are perfect major chords in the key of C; the central note of the third chord, being C sharp-D flat, is a discord. The first pair of fifths in the scale, with its central note, is a chord of the key; if we include the octave, the last pair of fifths, with its central note, is the same chord an octave higher than the lowest chord of the seven.

The application of the author's theory of colour in harmony with tone, as regards the scale formation, illustrates at once the difficulties of his position. He employs the three primary colours with their secondary developments. Twice three can only make six; consequently an extra tint must be brought into the scheme to yield seven parallelisms of colour and tone. The following extract from a given diagram will explain itself:—

Red.	Orange.	Yellow.	Green.
C,	D,	E,	F,
Blue.	Violet.	Ultra-Violet.
G,	A,	B.

Now, these primary colours here fall prettily enough to the notes of the common chord. But as the distances between C and E and E and G represent different types of imperfect concords, the colour system given is not in harmony with the divisions of the notation; and, as a result, while two tints of two of the primary colours (red and yellow) are given, three tints of the other primary colour (blue) are employed. A really just division would place the primary colours a major third apart, thus—

Red.	Yellow.	Blue.
C,	E,	G sharp,

with the intermediate sounds represented by the secondary and tertiary shades of the primary colours. The entire scheme, chromatically given, would therefore run thus:—

Red.	Deep-orange.	Orange.	Light-orange.	Yellow.
C,	C sharp,	D,	D sharp,	E,
Light-green.	Green.	Dark-green.	Blue.
F,	F sharp,	G,	G sharp,
Purple.	Violet.	Crimson.
F,	A sharp,	B,

By this arrangement the primaries fall at equal distances of major thirds apart to C, E, G sharp, and the secondary colours also lie at the same distances apart on D, F sharp, and A sharp. This scheme, though, represents no affinity between colour and harmony. Then, again, can it be maintained that the different tone intensities of the different octaves are to have no corresponding changes of colour intensities in any complete system of analogy? To proceed, all Mr. Hughes' circular diagrams furnishing his analogies are based upon this unevenly-balanced system of employing red and yellow with their secondaries, and blue with both secondary and tertiary developments. Ingenious in elucidation and beautiful in thought as such proposals of colour and tone often are, no satisfactory conclusions have, apparently, yet been drawn therefrom. Perhaps the base of such logic is at fault; for colour is not form, nor is melodic design tone-quality. If we compare like with like, as in putting colour side by side with tone-quality and pictorial design side by side with musical design, the genius of comparison does indeed find much scope for instructive and interesting analogies. Mr. Hughes enjoyed the (at least corresponding) friendship of Dr. Gauntlett, and quotes copiously from his letters. The Doctor is interested, if not a little fascinated, by Mr. Hughes' doctrines. In one letter Dr. Gauntlett says: "Why you should be able to explain the much-quarrelled-over connections (between tones and harmonies) is beyond my comprehension, and if I could discover the key, the result would be most important for the well-being of music. With this view, your system always interests me. I suspect it lies in that wonderful adaptability of the order of numbers." Putting aside a flavour of self-complacency in Dr. Gauntlett's words, or, it may be, a self-consciousness of ability to do great things with new tools, it does seem clear that Mr. Hughes' system had not produced upon the mind of his friend very definite results. No one can condemn Mr. Hughes' earnest, thoughtful speculations; especially as they are indeed earnest enough to incline the student to take a deeper interest in the mysteries of the art. Some of the diagrams want more fully entered-upon explanations; others express but little of practical value. They all show much thought and not a little ingenuity. Mr. Hughes says (quoting Dr. C. W. Siemens): "In the great workshop of Nature there are no lines of demarcation between the most exalted speculation and common-place practice, and that knowledge must lead up to one great result—that of an intelligent recognition of the Creator through His works." Still it is important that speculation shall be subjected to scientific proof, and common-place practices also be deduced from fixed principles, in order that really gainful knowledge may be secured. It cannot be said that Mr. Hughes' work realizes either positions. He has done good work, at least, in making some such advance upon his subject as may lead to further investigations. The work is richly and very handsomely got up, and in every way a credit to its publishers.

The Church Congress Hand-Book. By C. Mackeson. (Parker and Co.)—This useful and admirably conducted annual, which faithfully and carefully accompanies the migrations of the great ecclesiastical court of church opinion from year to year, gives a guide to the recent congress, an interesting description of the churches, etc., of Reading, biographical sketches of readers and speakers, together with valuable information of the past congress doings. In process of time these ably conducted records will, from their intelligent faithfulness and unbiassed clearness, become matters of great value, and readers should collect them from time to time. The type, portraits, and views are all excellent in their way.

An Ecclesiastical History of Reading. Edited by the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield, M.A. (E. J. and F. Blackwell, Market Place, Reading).—A well got up and interesting hand-book, including accounts of local churches, etc., mostly by clerical writers. From this work readers will learn, as they would from Mackeson's "Church Congress Guide," what a large amount of history the old town has been the scene of, and what a noble structure the Abbey was once upon a time. To musicians the most interesting chapter of the book, perhaps, is a well written account of local "Church Music," from the pen of Mr. F. J. Read, F.C.O., Mus.Bac. This shows that the good cause is flourishing fairly well in Reading, and that the town has some excellent organs. Mr. Read reminds us that a monk of Reading composed the earliest of known canons, "Sumer is icumen in." Some of the entries of the old churches are curious, as "1505.—Payed to the clerk for syngyng of the Passion on Palm Sunday, in all id." 1541.—Payd for a quart of malmesey for the clerk on Palm Sonday, iiij*d.*" Intoning during the season of fasting was evidently regarded as laborious and exhausting work. Then in 1549, when the English liturgy comes into use, are the following:—"Paid Sir Will'm for c'tayne songs that he bought for the church, vis.". "Paid to Sir Richard a Deane, for ridyng to Windesor for the s'vice in Englishe, iiij*s.*"; and "Paid for paper and inke for pricking the songs in Englishe, vi*id.*" These items show how early in the reformed church music took an honoured place. There are items concerning the purchase of pairs of organs, and for "playing upon the orgayns," and for "syngyng in the quere," which points also to the cultivation and preservation of church music at that period.

The Maidenhead Philharmonic Society announce their first concert for Nov. 25th. The programme will include a selection from Sir Arthur Sullivan's oratorio, "The Light of the World." Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus.Bac.Oxon., will conduct, and Miss Fenna, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, will be the principal soloists.

The committee of the Annual Festival of the Worcester County Musical Association, U.S., has made strenuous efforts to make its festival in 1883 a notable occasion, not only for the eminent artists engaged, but also for the excellent choice of works to be performed. It is scarcely possible to praise these efforts too highly. The festival was held in the afternoons and evenings at the Mechanic's Hall, Worcester, Mass., from Monday, Sept. 24th, to Friday, Sept. 28th. The works performed comprised the following numbers: Sept. 25th—Gounod's "St. Cecilia Mass" and miscellaneous selection. Selection from Handel's "L'Allegro et Il Penseroso," and miscellaneous selection. Wednesday—Schubert's Symphony in B minor and selection. Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust." Thursday—Bruch's "Fair Ellen," and selection. Selections from Wagner's "Lohengrin," and miscellaneous. Friday—Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony and selections. Saturday—Handel's oratorio, "Samson." The chorus comprised five hundred selected voices. Mr. Frederic Archer presided at the organ. Mr Carl Zerrahn conducted.

Passing Events.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann will presently pay a professional visit to this country.

Miss Alice Aloof gives the first of three concerts at the Brixton Hall on Oct. 16th.

Dr. Horace Hill, of Norwich, is about to publish an oratorio, "Nehemiah."

The Temple Church and the St. James's Chapel Royal resumed their choral services on Sunday last.

F. Lux has written a comic opera in two acts, "Die Fürsten von Athen."

Mr. Villiers Stanford will compose a cantata for next Birmingham Festival.

The Skinners' Company contribute £500 to the Royal College of Music in five annual instalments.

A new pianist, Miss Josephine Lawrence, has played at the Covent Garden Concerts with a good measure of success.

The Yorkshire Post has an excellent and lengthy analysis of Macfarren's "King David," from the pen of Mr. T. J. Dudeney.

Weber's "Jubilee Cantata" was sung with augmented choir at the Harvest Festival, St. Mark's, Myddleton-square, on Oct. 11th.

Mdme. Ellen Hopekirk will play at the Crystal Palace and in several provincial towns, before her visit to America next month.

The jurors of the Cork Exhibition have awarded a medal for a violin made by Mr. Walter H. Mayson, stating that this is the highest they have given.

The report is that the recent Eisteddfod meeting in Cardiff, notwithstanding the enormous outlay and expenses, resulted in a clear profit of some £550.

People's Concerts of excellent character are being given in Exeter. Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus.Bac., Mr. Harold Ryder, and other local professors, take part in these performances, as well as artists from London and elsewhere.

Mr. Walter Bache, Liszt's chief supporter here, gives his annual Pianoforte Recital on the birthday of his musical idol, Oct. 22nd, when Liszt enters upon his 73rd year. Mr. Bache confines his programme to the works of his favourite master.

It is understood that Mrs. Dutton Cook, the widow of the late Mr. Dutton Cook, the eminent dramatic critic, contemplates re-entering the profession. Before her marriage, as Miss Linda Scates, this lady was heard at the Philharmonic, Crystal Palace, Saturday, and other concerts, and was recognized as a pianist of very exceptional ability.

On Wednesday evening, Oct. 3rd, the first of a series of high-class "Entertainments for the People," was given at the Bethnal Green-road Congregational Church, Hackney. This was a grand ballad concert, the vocalists being Mdme. Clara West, Miss C. Wollaston, Miss Lottie West, Mr. W. Doble, and Mr. A. Tucker; pianist, Mr. W. West; organist, Mr. John E. West, A.C.O. There was a numerous and appreciative audience.

Mr William Lemare announces that, being ordered by his physician to take absolute rest, it is with feelings of regret that he finds it necessary to sever his connection of many years' standing in Brixton, and seek retirement in the country. Mr. Humphrey Stark, Mus.Bac.Oxon., will, for the present, represent Mr. Lemare as Principal of the Surrey County School of Music. Readers will be glad to know that Mr. Lemare's health is improving.

The case of Mr. Edward Solomon was brought before the Court of Bankruptcy, on Oct. 5th. The debtor was described as a musical composer, of Oxford-mansions and Bloomsbury-place, also of 272, Strand, and of Warwick-street, Pimlico. The liabilities were returned at £1,406, and assets £75, and resolutions were passed for the liquidation of the estate by arrangement, with Mr. James Waddell as trustee. Mr. James Davis explained that Mr. Waddell had not accepted the office. His Honour ordered a new first meeting to be held.

Mr. C. L. Williams, the esteemed organist of Gloucester Cathedral, has made a valuable and thoughtful suggestion to the effect that symphonies and instrumental works be written suitable for Service and Church Festival use. A modern form of the "Sonata di Chiesa," would indeed, be welcome, and would open up to the composer a field for the employment of his talents.

On September 23rd forty-eight years had elapsed since the death of Bellini. The anniversary was celebrated in Naples by a concert and other performances of his music, the occasion being made one of some little additional interest by an Elegy, composed by Florimo, a skilful transcription of one of Bellini's melodies, for violoncello solo, and by excellent solo singing, and a fine rendering of the beautiful quartet in "Il Puritani."

On St. Luke's Day, Thursday next, the 18th inst., the Harvest Festival will be celebrated at St. Margaret Pattens Church, Rood Lane, Fenchurch-street. Weber's Mass in E flat will be sung at 12 noon. After the Evensong at 7.30, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given. Mr. Alfred Kenningham will sing the tenor solos, and Mr. Walter E. Stark will preside at the organ. The arrangements, as usual, will be under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

The annual thanksgiving for the ingathering of the harvest was held in the Wimborne Minster on Sunday last. The order of service was as follows:—Morning, Boyce in C; anthem, "O Lord, how manifold," by Barnby. Evening service, Arnold in A; anthem, "Ascribe unto the Lord," by Travers. After evening service Mr. Smith, the organist, played Rossini's "Cujus animam" with much effect.

The Royal Victoria Coffee Hall re-opens for the winter season in October with a most attractive programme. On Thursday evenings, for a few weeks, a musical entertainment entitled the "Rose Queen" will be given. It includes soloists, choruses and ballets, and represents the old English customs of dancing round a maypole, crowning a village maiden, and Morris dances. On Tuesday evenings, through the kindness of the Trustees of the Gilchrist Fund, the Committee of the Hall have been able to arrange for the delivery of Penny Science Lectures by eminent lecturers. The Park Band Society will give a performance before and after each lecture.

The Harvest Festival at St. Michael's, Bowes Park, Southgate, was held on the 3rd inst, the services including a full choral Evensong at 7.30 p.m. The music sung at the latter service included Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, by W. G. Wood in F; Anthem, "I will give thanks," (Barnby); and Te Deum, Smart in F, the choir numbering as usual on these occasions, over forty voices. Mr. Henry J. Baker presided at the organ. It may be mentioned as an interesting fact worthy of notice, that St. Michael's is now, one of the few churches in the northern suburbs at which there is a choral celebration every Sunday at mid-day.

Service Lists.

London Agency: Mr. W. H. HELE, 59, Gresham St., E.C.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be sound, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

SOME MUSICAL ETHICS AND ANALOGIES.

[A Paper read before the College of Organists, June 5th, 1883.]

BY HENRY C. BANISTER.

Now, if this is in the main true, and applicable, with some technical deviations, to Musical Art, it will not be difficult—nay, I fancy it will be almost inevitable—at once to associate certain modern names with the Romantic, the iridescent, school: the school of excitement, dazzle, enthusiasm, glow: in all of which there may be, let us remember, life: reactionary life: reaction against pedantry, stiffness, formalism, conventionalism, stagnation, and artificialism; even as was the case with the rise of the modern Romantic School of Poetry; and so far, so good. But it is of the Classical that I am speaking, specially: and about this, let it be repeated,—

"The name is graven on the workmanship."

But then that workmanship is not the idiom or manner of an age, a country: but is the outcome of genius, and of truth and beauty, which are of and for all time.

Bach, in the case supposed, does present the idea in its unadorned purity, strength, suggestiveness. It need not shrink thus to stand: it is true: suggestive and susceptible of true harmonies. It needs no iridescence: only white light. But then follows,—not clothing to cover it, not apology to excuse it: but trial to prove it: as though it were the stern goodness of a righteous man. And, like that, it comes forth as gold, "purified seven times": tested by counterpoint, by tonal alteration or modification, by inverse movement, by augmentation, by diminution, by modulation, by stretti. Those are seven ways: but, after all, seven is the perfect number; and the test is perfect.

Is there not some analogy to all this, for instance, in the longest poem by Mr. Browning? Firstly, he arrests you, accosts you with—

"Do you see this Ring?
'Tis Rome-work, made to match
(By Castellani's imitative craft)
Etrurian circlets found, some happy morn,
After a dropping April; found alive
Spark-like 'mid unearthed slope-side fig-tree roots
That roof old tombs at Chiusi: soft, you see,
Yet crisp as jewel-cutting. There's one trick,
(Craftsmen instruct me) one approved device
And but one, fits such slivers of pure gold
As this was,—such mere oozings from the mine,
Virgin as oval tawny pendent tear
At beehive-edge when ripened combs o'erflow—
To bear the file's tooth and the hammer's tap:
Since hammer needs must widen out the round,
And file emboss it fine with lily-flowers,
Ere the stuff grow a ring-thing right to wear." *

And then he describes what that "trick" is: and in this, the analogy fails, by the way, for the trick is to "melt up wax with honey, so to speak":—to "mingle gold with gold's alloy." But then, the ring presented, he goes on—"What of it?"

Yes: just what the shallow, without intuitive perception, say of an unadorned, plain musical subject:—

"What of it?
'Tis a figure, a symbol, say;
A thing's sign: now for the thing signified."

"Do you see this square old yellow book, I toss
I' the air, and catch again, and twirl about
By the vellum covers,—pure crude fact
Secreted from man's life when hearts beat hard,
And brains, high-blooded, ticked two centuries since?"

Then he proceeds to give the narration of the history, the germ of all: but still "crude fact." He has given the subject: the answer: the countersubject: philosophizes about, hints at, suggests the possibilities, the potentialities enclosed in that history,—even as the Exposition of a Fugue does with what the uninitiated, the unsusceptible, regard as like "pure crude fact." But, then, after the speculations of "Half-Rome" and "The other Half-Rome,"—just the Episode that succeeds the Exposition—he proceeds to give the relation of that same history, in various ways, by the various characters, with various prominences, and, perhaps, various suppressions, even distortions: but the same history, the same subject, in various lights: only,—mark you!—with a bias, in every case. Now, on the other hand, when the honest musician presents an idea, a musical thought to you,—he says, as it were,—"Do you see this Ring?—this Book? Do you hear this subject?"

"What of it?" say you. "Well, I will shew you what of it." And then he proceeds to shew you its richness and many sidedness: not to leave you in bewilderment: not to suppress the weak points, exaggerate the strong, distort the doubtful,—but to shew you strength and truth, all round and all through.

I do not know whether this seems to you a fancifully-wrought analogy: a mere conceit, in the old sense of that term. But, I confess, again, that it is because I have learned something, practically, theoretically, and by observation, of the mode of presenting, carrying out, and developing a germ-thought, in music, that I can, with the enhanced pleasure that I have referred to, follow a train of thought, and to some extent enter into and apprehend an artistic production, in verse, in prose, in any art in which continuous thought, and varied, many-sided presentation, may find its expression. It makes me feel in sympathetic brotherhood with all true human intellects.

And this varied presentation is Classical: not ornamental. It is not polish: not external chasing, however elegant, on a surface. It is not sensuous: iridescent. It is hardly rhetorical: it is logical: it is a development of innate truth. It is presentation in white light, according to the previously cited definition.

But be it observed, "the re-assumption of the glorious name" of Classical is of little avail unless there be the animating spirit and power. Heroic verse presupposes, necessitates, heroes and heroic deeds; or it becomes mere bombast, or schoolboy-exercise. And this reassumption, moreover, is a different thing from, and is not to be attained by, the donning of the antique garb: by prattling in bygone speech and idiom. Fascinating indeed is it, to any of us who have any measure of the historical imagination, to transport ourselves into old times, old scenes, old manners, old modes of thought and of expression. This is one reason why we experience such peculiar pleasure in visiting ruined abbeys, castles, and the like:—our historical imagination seems to be thereby kindled and helped. It is in proportion to the extent of this element,—is it not?—that we have the sense of the picturesque in a scene. It is this element in our minds, in a more or less exaggerated or distorted form, that has given rise, I suppose, to the—shall I say?—fads or crazes for blue china, or for so-called æsthetic furniture or dress. And is there not, in our art, something of an analogous kind, in the anachronism, artistically speaking, of writing, now-a-days, pieces of music in the obsolete dance-measures? We may build Queen Anne houses: but then we can inhabit them. But why write Gavottes, Bourrées, and the like, when they are not danced, now? No dance-motion such as the old writers witnessed, and were at least prompted if not inspired by, now impels our writers. Manufactured picturesqueness is surely a strange fad. I know a house, by the side of a London Canal, where there is a manufactured ruin, of an abbey, I believe made of virgin cork, with vacant window frames, and so on, on a slope down to the water's edge. I am not impressed by it, neither am I carried back to old times by a modern Gavotte. Does any one say Oh! I like the quaintness of it? Ah! listen to what an authority on philology says about that word quaint—

* The Ring and the Book.

Digitized by Google

"Its primary meaning is artificially [not artistically] elegant or ingenious, then affectedly artificial, and finally, odd, antique, yet retaining always an element of the pleasing. The idea of quaintness belongs at present most commonly to style of thought and verbal expression in which appears a combination of fancy, originality, delicacy, and force, yet a disharmony with present modes. Quaint architecture, for instance, is in detail antiquated and curious, showing an obsolete beauty and an unfashionable ingenuity."*

Now, rest assured, I make no personal allusions, and have not any personal references in my mind. I freely acknowledge the charm of some modern movements of this class that I have heard: and I know what a pleasurable pastime it is, in one's lighter moments, to exercise one's fancy and ingenuity in writing such pieces. I only would, with all kindness, caution young writers against throwing dust into their own eyes, by disguising, perhaps, very ordinary thoughts in this quaint garb. "Quaint," and, as Sterndale Bennett used to say to me, "characteristic," are rather dangerous words.

These attempts to reproduce old manners are not often successful. Even so great a man as Spohr, in his Historical Symphony, is generally considered not to have reproduced anything, from Handel to Auber, but to have re-illustrated his own versatility in conjunction with his mannerism: the movements, after all, only represent Spohr in different suits of clothes. Those of us who remember the man, know very well that Mozart's clothes would have been a misfit: and so with Mozart's style: that would not fit the musician, Spohr.

There are many other analogies and ethics to which I might draw your attention; but time warns me that I must hardly even venture upon the summing-up of what I have, as it may seem to you, somewhat discursively, advanced.

What is idealising? Is it not the elimination from the object presented of all that is unbeautiful, unattractive, seizing hold of and presenting all in it that is admirable, and, moreover, the discernment and making evident of all the potentialities of good, the latent beauty, pruned of that which is accidental and of the nature of excrescence: and so presenting not a false, not a distorted, not an exaggerated, not even a one-sided view: but the view of the rich possibilities, rather than the actual: because the blemishes in the actual are from outside: the beautiful, the good, is from within? Is not this what we mean by an idealised portrait? Is it not the kind of portrait that we should like our friends to take of us, of our characters; and which it would be better for our charity to take of our friends?

Now music is not an idealising art: it is itself, not a selective, nor an eliminatory art: it is itself in its essence, ideal. It is a yearning art: actually expressive of the sensual, it cannot be. Music is a sentient art: it appeals to us through one of our senses: but sensual it is not. It may be that certain composers have presented it in highly-wrought sensuous fashion: and we are sentient beings. It may be that, as I said before, some have associated music with sensual surroundings. But are we to say, with the writer that I referred to, that "Music is neither good nor bad?" Because "out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing," is Language the less a Divine gift: a good, therefore?

And so, music is good,—a Divine gift and endowment.* That patriarch who to so many of you is only a name, but to those of us who knew him a name always pronounced with reverence—Cipriani Potter—used to say to me—"All good music is melancholy." I fancy that what he really meant was that it is ideal. And inasmuch as the ideal is not realised: is not the actual, the real,—but the ideal still,—there will be associated with it that kind of undefined melancholy, that sense of something that might have been but is not, that wistfulness which the Laureate expresses in asking

"Who can tell
Why to smell
The violet
Recalls the dewy prime
Of youth and buried time?"

Yes: and anything which does this,—engenders at once the dissatisfaction and the yearning, in this grovelling, sensuous, nay, sensual world,—is so far purifying. Only it is Music, true Music that must do this. After that, if we have ears to hear, do we not feel that which another poet has expressed, only with mythological phraseology (we can substitute Beethoven or Handel for Apollo)—

"Oh! ecstasy,
Oh! happiness of him who once has heard
Apollo singing! For his ears the sound
Of grosser music dies, and all the earth
Is full of subtle undertones, which change
The listener and transform him. As he sang—
Of what I know not, but the music touched
Each chord of being—I felt my secret life
Stand open to it, as the parched earth yawns
To drink the Summer rain; and at the call
Of those refreshing waters, all my thought
Stir from its dark and secret depths, and burst
Into sweet odorous flowers, and from their wells
Deep call to deep, and all the mystery
Of all that is, laid open."†

And again, the same poet, of the vocation of poet, artist, or musician:—

"To be fulfilled with Godhead as a cup
Filled with a precious essence, till the hand,
On marble or on canvas falling, leaves
Celestial traces, or from reed or string
Draws out faint echoes of the voice Divine
That bring God nearer to a faithless world.

Or, higher still and fairer and more blest,
To be His seer, His prophet; to be the voice
Of the Ineffable Word; to be the glass
Of the Ineffable Light, and bring them down
To bless the earth, set in a Shrine of Song."‡

Mr. Thomas, bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards, has been presented by the Duchess of Cambridge with a splendid pearl and diamond scarf pin, and the band-sergeant with a handsome pin set with diamonds and lapis lazuli. Her Royal Highness has also made a substantial donation to the widows and orphans funds of the Nulli Secundus (Coldstream Guards) Band Club.

A correspondent says with regard to Mr. Banner's Liverpool Choir, that it has been decided since leaving St. Cuthbert's not to offer the services of this able choir to any other church, at all events for the present; but, under the direction of Mr. Claude S. Ridley, they will proceed to rehearse Spohr's "Last Judgment," which will probably be rendered with orchestral accompaniments at a future date.

* "There is this peculiar advantage about melody, that per se, it is absolutely pure and remote from trivial ideas. The song and the dance may have their associations, good or evil; but the pure melody in itself is pure indeed: it is gay, or pathetic, or stately or sublime, but in any case there is something in the thrill of a choice chord, and the progression of a perfect melody, which seems to raise the hearer above the trifling affairs of life. At times it 'brings all Heaven before our eyes.' . . . Music is naturally more pure and removed from the concrete and sensuous ideas of ordinary life than a drama can usually be."—Prof. W. THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

The constitution of the Leeds orchestra for large choral works has proved as before to be a satisfactory one; and generally it is that adopted at Birmingham, with the wood wind doubled. Sir M. Costa's first experiment included the doubling of the brass as well, but experience proved this to be unnecessary, so the brass remains the same as usual, save that two trumpets and two cornets are secured to form the upper group. Sir Arthur Sullivan deserves to be complimented upon his efforts to secure the proper trio of alto, tenor, and bass trombones. The French custom of using three in B flat, and the usual plan in England of employing two tenors and one bass, are not altogether satisfactory. The bass trombone in G is necessary to do justice to the lower notes below F, and the alto is equally necessary for the proper sustentation of the upper part, for the tenor cannot produce with effect the high B natural, C, etc., which appear in the scores of the great masters, as in "Elijah." The doubled wood wind is a gain perhaps in the choral and fugal movements as giving additional, without intrusive, strength, the flutes and oboes in contrapuntal work generally doubling the soprano, the clarionets taking the alto, and the bassoons dividing the tenor and bass. En passant, unfortunately, the wood wind players not regarding their instruments as so essential as they really are in forte passages, at times neglect their responsibilities by taking rests not in the score; such occasional negligence always causes a sensible deterioration in the orchestral tone. When all is said and done, it is true that no orchestra is so expressive, elastic in action, passionate withal, and so pure in tone as one not much exceeding 60 players, and without doubled wind in any department. All the same, the combined effect of the Leeds orchestra and chorus was for the most part excellent. Thursday's morning concert brought to light Raff's "Weltende, gericht, Neue Welt." There is no question about the high claims made and earned by Raff in this noble piece of tone-thought. Whether the experiment of an orchestral supremacy in oratorio will be followed is not a matter for present discussion. Suffice it to say that the grandeur of the newly heard oratorio; the complete contempt of the composer in his tone-painting for the opinion of worldlings yearning only for pretty music; the elevation and combination of fine counterpoint with lofty picturesque thought; and the magnificent orchestral effects, will make Raff's last not only his greatest work, but an epoch in modern art forms. The composer has in plan enlarged upon Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's Symphony-Cantata, "The Hymn of Praise," and now the latest sign of the modern supremacy of orchestral function is the setting up of the Symphony-Oratorio. That Raff entered deliberately into such a scheme must be accepted as true, for he well knew how to write for voices, and was one of the most accomplished, if not quite the most skilled, of modern composers since Mendelssohn's time in the handling of practical, living counterpoint. His power over the orchestra, too, was truly remarkable; so he was fairly equipped for the composition of oratorio upon the lines left by the great composer of "St. Paul" and "Elijah," had he chosen to follow the usual oratorio plan. In the "World's End," there is practically only one character, that of St. John, to whom is assigned two solos, and the recitation of his vision of the last days. Three other airs are given to the contralto as "A Voice" occupying a sort of reflective position. Neither soprano or tenor solos appear in the score. Throughout the work the orchestra is indeed the supreme musical medium. The section of the work actually treating of the end of the world is subdivided into four. In the second of these are four orchestral intermezzi describing the horsemen of the Apocalypse; thus pestilence, war, famine, death and hell are depicted with a strong hand, recalling the pictorial power of the painter Martin. Wonderful passages for the violins whirl the listener's spirit into the realms of imagination, and the varied powers of the orchestra are handled with striking boldness. Choruses of Martyrs, a petition for judgment, and a thanksgiving for the granting of the petition, are exceedingly impressive in parts. The despair of mankind and the last throes of nature are pourtrayed; then comes an expressive intermezzo, and a chorus of despair representing the people calling upon the rocks to fall upon them and to hide them. There is much power and some strongly built contrapuntal work here. The second section is "The Judgment." An intermezzo describes the Resurrection with dexterous skill, cries of despair and celestial strains are heard, intermingled. A double chorus is introduced of the Righteous and the Wicked, with strains of joy and cries for mercy. This section terminates with a chorus of praise. The third section contains three choral numbers, two of joy and one of a prayerful type built upon the sentence "The grace of our Lord be with us all, Amen." Some fine contrapuntal writing and an impressive coda close the work. The band was admirable throughout this trying music, and no small thanks are here due to Sir A. Sullivan's care and firmness. The chorus, though evidently well prepared for their work, were not always happy in the most trying sentences, and at times sang out of tune. Miss Damian and Mr. Santley executed the soli parts admirably. The second half of this concert was devoted to Handel in a selection from his works. On the whole the committee do well to avoid giving that master's well-known works in full; people want upon these occasions to move somewhat out of the beaten track, and to advance their knowledge of the riches of the musical world. The soloists in the selection were Miss A. Marriott, Miss H. Wilson, Messrs. Maas and Blower. At the evening concert, Mr. Barnby's Ninety-seventh Psalm was produced and distinctly added to his reputation as a composer. The movements are an instrumental Prelude, chorus, soli work for baritone, soprano with chorus (a movement of melodious power and likely to become very popular), and contralto. An orchestral interlude, some graceful writing, but nothing of particular interest is introduced. There is an admirably written double quartet, a March and chorus setting of the "Gloria Patri," this being worked up with much power and skill. The composition is one doing much credit to the English school, and it displays a character and dignity the composer has hardly before attained to. The adaptation of one of the choruses from Mozart's "King Thamos," as the so-called Third Motet, was capitally rendered, though adaptations should be eschewed at great festivals. Bach's cantata, "Thou Guide of Israel," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," compositions of a widely different character, were finely performed. The famous chorus exceeded themselves at this concert. The organists, Dr. W. Spark and Mr. Walter Parratt, have shared the playing duties in connection with the instrument they are such well-known professors of. Each of the days' performances showed unabated signs of the enthusiasm of a large assembly of listeners.

The proceedings of Thursday were pleasantly diversified by the Mayor's luncheon, at which not only many distinguished visitors were invited, but very properly the guest list included the chief artists engaged at the Festival. Friday morning was a decided improvement in the weather. The Duke of Albany attended the first part of the performance of Macfarren's "King David," the Duchess being absent through indisposition. The performance was quite a memorable one for English art. For consistent treatment, well applied science, and thorough musicianship, "King David" takes rank as one of the most satisfactory oratorios the world has welcomed for many years. "David" has already been noticed in these columns and will soon be heard in London, so it is not necessary here to enter largely into the performance of Friday week, though it is important to say that the impressions of the performance even exceeded those arising from a previous book inspection of the work. Prof. Macfarren's well chosen plot bearing upon the story of the King's sin and repentance is already familiar to all. From cover to cover the score of the oratorio displays the composer at his very best. Fine, vigorous choral writing; clever, healthy, frankly conducted fugue; real dramatic power when required; and thoroughly masterly instrumentation make up a work which must not only gratify but astonish all who remember the composer's age, affliction of blindness, and laborious life. Principals, band and chorus, did their utmost to secure a truly remarkable first performance, which reflected much credit upon the firm, intelligent, painstaking direction of the conductor, Sir A. Sullivan. At the close of the work, ending with a magnificent doxology, the composer received such an ovation as falls to few artists. The performers and audience out-vied each other in their enthusiastic and admiring applause. So terminated a truly notable occasion as regards English art. Gade's "Crusaders" was the chief feature of the evening concert, this being performed because its author had not been able to undertake a new composition for the Festival. Miss Annie Marriott, Messrs. Lloyd and King sustained the chief parts most artistically. The delicate and finished instrumentation was delightfully rendered, and the chorus excellent. Beethoven's Mass in D, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" formed the programme of Saturday morning. Certainly the performance of the great "Mass" was one of the best yet given; there were however a few inaccuracies in the band parts. The chorus, notwithstanding an occasional unsteadiness in this and in the still more familiar "Hymn of Praise," did wonders. The perfection of their intonation, their attention to light and shade, their splendid attack and superb quality of tone, call for the warmest congratulations and praise. The concert was closed with the National Anthem, and Sir A. Sullivan and Mr. Broughton, the able chorus master, received fitting ovations for their successful labour.

With regard to the last popular concert of the Festival, the local correspondent of the Musical Standard writes:—Saturday night's concert was very well attended, and the programme consisted mainly of excerpts from the more important works of the Festival. The chorus sang selections from Macfarren's "King David," Raff's "End of the World," Barnby's Ninety-seventh Psalm (conducted by the composer), Cellier's "Gray's Elegy" (also conducted by the composer), and other works. Solos were sung by Miss Anna Williams, Miss A. Marriott, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Miss Damian. Mr. Maas sang with much sweetness and expression "Cujus Animam" from the "Stabat Mater," and "Lend me your aid" (Gounod). Mr. King was loudly applauded for his fine rendering of Sullivan's "Henry the Eighth's Song." The band and chorus all did their work in splendid style. The concert was brought to a close by the singing of the National Anthem, conducted by Sir Arthur Sullivan, the audience all standing, and few who were present will forget the scene of excitement that ensued as the last strains of the chorus died away. The Festival has been the most successful ever held in Leeds, and it is expected that more than £2000 will be handed over to the charities of the town, after paying expenses.

As regards Mdme. Valleria, the committee evidently made a wise choice in selecting her as prima donna for the Festival. In the "Elijah" on the opening day she produced a most favourable impression, and in the later concerts, as she became accustomed to the size of the hall, and thus gained confidence, she more than justified the highest anticipations. I have no hesitation in saying that this accomplished vocalist is destined to make her mark in oratorio music, as she has already done on the operatic stage.

The world knows well the extremes which characterise mankind; as the man who can only enjoy accepted types and the go-a-head to whom pure thought is nothing apart from progress, and progress present is as nothing as compared with some advance or other to come. Shakespeare has been often improved for such restless spirits, and Wagner has in the interests of such people improved the scores of Gluck and Beethoven. The conceit of being wise beyond one's generation adds always to the strength of the so-called "advanced school." Progress, by all means, but let us not mistake eccentricity for genius or novelty for originality. A writer in a Leeds daily paper has nothing encouraging to say with regard to the English works produced at the recent festival; his great spirit disdains the beautiful and yearns for the vast. Raff's experimental exaltation of the orchestra in the domain of oratorio, however, appeals to his mind; apparently he hardly knows why, for he says the composer "has found in discords his richest resources." We shall next hear of the man of business who prefers copper to gold and silver to bank notes. It suffices for this writer that the music in question implied progress, merely because it proved to be experimental. However, the writer's words may be given.

"Raff has found in discords his richest resources and most effective materials. His work has been a nut too hard for the musical critics to crack. Last week the newspapers teemed with the cant of criticism. Columns were written in the usual style, and were quite apt so long as ordinary compositions were dealt with. But Raff was a complete puzzle to the Telegraph, the Times (what will Herr Hueffer say to this?), the Standard, &c. Because his methods clashed with their preconceived ideas, and with the musical laws they had been for years laying down to admiring readers, they made the terrible mistake of trying to extinguish him by ridicule, and by continuous asseveration that his aims were beyond the province of music. Further reflection has probably changed their views, and they would give much to recall their utterances of Thursday, Oct. 11. But it would never do for the great London critics, who fancy they lead England by the nose in musical matters, to cry peccavimus. That Raff's work will influence composition in England is perhaps too much to expect, for we have no English composer fit to wear his mantle. The next performance of the 'World's End' in England will be an event to note; and we predict that before that occurs, the great London critics will have wholly changed their tune."

The truth is, no one has sought to disparage Raff's work, which contains some noble music as everybody allows and—possibly this information will be unpalatable in some quarters—some superb contrapuntal writing upon the purest classical lines. The great critics the learned writer in Leeds speaks so glibly about, and thinks so little of, will be among the first to welcome Raff's great work in London or elsewhere undoubtedly, and will in due time enlarge more upon its contents. They could hardly be expected to write more fully than they did under the pressure of a busy week, writing at midnight and under the necessity of transmitting their opinions as briefly as possible by the telegraph wires.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Mrs. Hutchinson.
Symphony, No. 4, in B flat, Op. 60	Beethoven.
Bolero, "Zaïde"	Berlioz.
(First time). Mrs. Hutchinson.
Overture, "King Lear"	Berlioz.
(First performance at the Saturday Concerts).

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

An assemblage, not very numerous, welcomed with satisfaction the commencement of the twenty-eighth series of Saturday concerts at the Crystal Palace. For the first time in England, Dvorak's concerto in G minor for pianoforte, was performed. This composition is one of his early ones—Op. 33—and was written long before he became known to Brahms, who was the first to recognise his great talents and obtain for him the desire of all young composers, a generous and appreciative publisher. This is another instance of a timely intervention by which failure in the life of a genius has been prevented. The early history of Dvorak brings the following quotation from Mr. Irving Montague to mind: "That there is a Divinity which shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may, is never more clearly demonstrated than when in the shifting scenes of an eventful life one finds circumstances, as welcome as they are unexpected, crop up at that particular moment when the intervention of nothing else could have prevented a failure. Many such instances must take place with the most prosaic, but with those to whom fortune has been fickle, those who buffeted about from pillar to post, at home and abroad, have had to fight tooth and nail from their youth up, it must be strangely manifest."

The honour of having been the first to introduce Dvorak's works in England belongs to Mr. Manns, who in 1879 introduced his first set of Slavonic Rhapsodies at the Crystal Palace. A symphony and an overture and other shorter pieces have since that time been performed here. Dvorak is at present an organist and teacher of music at Prague. It is well to make this known, as it has very recently been said by one of our leading critics, that an organist can hardly be expected to write anything worth hearing, especially in the way of orchestration.

The concerto in G minor is, as I have already said, one of Dvorak's early works. There is a freshness and charm about it, but at the time of writing it, he had yet—like other young artists—to see his touch gain firmness, the grasp of his art stronger, and his powers more developed. It contains nothing of the old forms with the exception of the introduction, and as is the case with most concertos of the new school, the pianoforte is subordinate to the orchestra. The first movement is long and tedious, the andante is rather more interesting, with some Schubert-like combination for reeds and horns, but in the finale the young composer shows much ingenuity and individuality, and the Bohemian gipsy element which abounds in some of his later works is here charmingly manifested. The work upon the whole was fairly well received, but failed to make a deep impression. Mr. Beringer was deservedly recalled after his masterly performance of it.

The other numbers in the programme call for no special remark, but at least a word of praise must be given to Mrs. Hutchinson for her artistic singing of Handel's and Berlioz's songs. R. S.

Another contributor writes :—

The new pianoforte concerto of Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, pleased me, in common with other connoisseurs. It is bright, melodious, and finely scored for the band, if a little rhapsodical in parts. The andante in D major, opened by the horn, is thought to be the best of the three movements, all of which, by the way, are in common time. Mr. Oscar Beringer, as usual, played admirably, and with laudable self-control. The execution of the No. 4 symphony was so exquisite as to evoke an extra demonstration of approval. I have rarely, if ever, heard finer violin playing than in the finale at the episodes. The overture of Berlioz, performed by Mr. Dannreuther at a "Wagner Society" concert in November, 1873, struck me as dramatic, but dull and laboured. The subject certainly does not inspire cheerful ideas. The introductory movement is too protracted; the composer has here made good use of the hautboy. The late Raff's "Autumn" symphony No. 10 in F minor, will be in good keeping with the sere and falling leaves this (Saturday) afternoon, and Wagner comes to the front. A. M.

BRIGHTON.

The Autumn festival in connection with the Brighton, Hove, and Preston Church Choir Association was held on Oct. 11th, in St. Martin's Church, Lewes Road. The Association was formed last year to endeavour to raise the standard of Church music in the town by periodical festivals in the larger churches. The first was held at St. Peter's in the autumn of last year, and the second in the spring of the present at St. Mary's. The number of choirs affiliated has steadily increased, but are not so large as might be wished, considering the comprehensive basis of the Association. Since the last festival some alterations in the rules have been made, calculated to bring about the more harmonious working of the body. The post of conductor and choirmaster is now filled by Mr. Alfred King, Mus.Bac., who must be congratulated upon the improved order of service which he has compiled. Mr. Charles Bailey, the organist of St. Martin's, was organist of the festival. The number of choristers was 350. The choirs represented were those of Hove Parish Church, St Andrew's, Hove; St. Peter's, St. Nicolas', Christ Church, Chapel Royal, St. John's, Carlton Hill; St. Mary's, St. Martin's, St. James's, St. Luke's, St. Saviour's, and the Holy Trinity, Ship Street. The choirs of the Church of the Annunciation, All Soul's, and All Saint's would have joined but for unavoidable circumstances. The festival commenced with a celebration of the Holy Communion at eight o'clock in the morning, the remaining Services being two evensongs, one at four, and the other at eight. At the afternoon Service, the organist, Mr. C. Bailey, opened with a voluntary, an Andante by Gladstone, and the choirs then entered singing the hymn "Onward, Christian Soldiers," set to a new tune by Mr. Alfred King, the conductor, thoroughly martial in its character, the harmonies being splendidly arranged, with the introduction of two or three unison bars. The anthem was Barnby's "I will give thanks," the "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis" being sung to H. Smart's Service in G. The strength of the choir at the afternoon Service was not sufficiently represented to give any fair idea of their capabilities, and this seriously interfered with the general success of the service. The "Magnificat," sung to H. Smart's arrangement, was sung most effectively, the unison passages being given with very fair precision. In the "Gloria," however, there was a tendency to drag, but this was quickly set right by Mr. King. The anthem was sung in excellent time, the rich harmonies of the semi-chorus and the chorale being most masterly. The sermon was preached by the Ven. Archdeacon Walker. He selected as his text Psalm cvi. 12: "Then believed they His words, they sang His praise." At the close of the service, an offertory was taken in aid of the funds of the Association, and the organist played the March from "Scipio" (Handel) as the congregation left the church. In the evening the church was filled in every part. The Band of the 4th Royal (Irish) Dragoon Guards assisted, accompanying the principal pieces. This proved specially effective in the Canticles and Anthem, the large attendance of the members of the choirs also adding to the general effect, which was simply grand. The whole of the band accompaniments were written by Mr. Alfred King, the conductor. The entire service was characterised by great heartiness. The festival was one of the most successful ever held by the Association, Mr. Alfred King's conductorship greatly aiding this result.

BRIXTON.—Madame Worrell gave her annual concert at the Brixton Hall, on Thursday, 11th inst., which proved very successful. The programme, a somewhat lengthy one, was tolerably free from usual royalty songs; the various items on the whole were judiciously selected. Madame Worrell, who is justly very popular, was received with great fervour by the numerous audience assembled, and encored in each of her songs; Gounod's "O that we two were maying," creating the most impression. Madame Osborne Williams sang "Panciulle che il core" ("Dinorah"), with much taste, and joined Madame Worrell in Rossini's "Quis est homo" ("Stabat Mater"). The other vocalists were Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Annie Butterworth, Messrs. Henry Guy, F. H. Cozens, Fredk. Bevan, and I. Budd; all of whom acquitted themselves with much success, especially Miss Maud Cameron in "O Roberto che adoro," and Mr. Henry Guy in "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight" ("Oberon"). Mention should be made of Mr. H. Guy's charming trio "Reflection," which was well rendered by Madame Worrell, Miss Butterworth, and the composer. Mons. Albert contributed with great skill two solos on the violoncello, and Mr. Turle Lee ably conducted.

ST. BOTOLPH, ALDGATE, E.C.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in this, the parish church, on Sunday last. In the morning the Te Deum was sung to Smart's setting in F, and the anthem was "Fear not, O Land" (Goss). At the evening service Spohr's cantata "God, Thou art great," was rendered in place of the anthem, by an augmented choir under the direction of Mr. W. T. Goold, organist and choirmaster. The treble solos were sustained with much ability by Master Willie Halls (of Mr. Stedman's choir), and Mr. C. T. Grimsdich rendered valuable assistance in the duet.

ST. PAUL'S, AVENUE ROAD, N.W.—The Harvest Festival will be held on Sunday next, the 21st inst. The first evensong of the festival will be held at 7.30 p.m. on Saturday, at which service a full band will accompany the choir as well as the organ. Mr. E. M. Lott, F.C.O., will assist Mr. W. H. Carpenter at the organ, and the Rev. J. W. Bennett, M.A., will conduct. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis will be Gadsby in C, and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" will be given as the anthem. Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" will be sung after the sermon.

TULSE HILL.—It is with feelings of satisfaction that one has to chronicle from time to time individual efforts to restore oratorio to its rightful home, the Church. At the Harvest Festival on Saturday the 13th inst., at Holy Trinity Church, the 1st and 2nd parts of Haydn's "Creation" were performed at the evening Service with full orchestra, under the able direction and chiefly through the energy of the esteemed organist, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac. The choir numbered 70 voices, including Mr. Stedman's choir of boys. The Service consisted of the shortened form of Evening Prayer. The "Magnificat" was sung to Mr. Stark's skilful and effective service in D, which was originally composed for full orchestra. The oratorio took the place of the sermon, and between the parts a collection was made and hymns sung. The choruses were all admirably rendered, no doubt the sacred character of the building and the devout demeanour of the large congregation greatly enhancing the effect; in fact, the choruses "The Heavens are telling," and "Achieved is the glorious work," were rendered with excellent precision and taste that could vie with many of our best choral societies. The soprano solos were divided between Masters H. Townsend, W. Hull, and R. Walena, who acquitted themselves with great success. Mr. Stedman sang "In native worth" very artistically, and also the remainder of the tenor music. Mr. Robert Poole likewise well sustained the bass solos. The service commenced and finished with processional hymns, which were the least successful of all that preceded or followed them, the organ, orchestra, and choir occasionally not keeping together. Messrs. W. E. Stark and E. J. Quance presided at the organ and Mr. Victor Buziau very ably led the orchestra. After the service Mendelssohn's "Cornelius March" was played; the overture to "Athalie" and Romanza in G (Beethoven) was also announced to be performed, but omitted for want of time.

PRESTON.—On Sunday, October 14th, the annual Harvest Festival was celebrated at Holy Trinity Church. The choir was augmented, and there was also a full band of 36 performers. The morning Service opened with an organ solo, Adagio from violin concerto (Spohr), rendered with great taste by the organist, Mr. W. B. Norwood. The anthem, morning and evening, was "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Sir G. A. Macfarren). The evening Service commenced with a clarionet solo "With verdure clad" (Haydn). At the conclusion of the services the band played in a spirited manner, "Cornelius March" (Mendelssohn); Mr. I. Norwood wielded the baton. There were very large congregations at both services.—Mr. I. Norwood announces that he will give a grand concert on Monday next, the 22nd inst., in aid of the Preston Infirmary, when "The British Army Quadrilles" will be rendered for the first time in Preston, with all the original effects. Miss Lillie Snowden, R.A.M., a Preston lady, and Signor Foli, will be the vocalists.

HIGHER BROUGHTON, MANCHESTER.—A Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held on Oct. 12th, in the Church of St. John the Evangelist. The processional hymn was No. 480, the tune being "St. Gertrude" (Sullivan). The chants were Higgin in T, Lawes in C, and Smith in A flat. Weber's harvest cantata, "Jubilee," took the place of the anthem. The music is characteristic throughout, and in many parts is exceedingly striking and impressive. There are recitatives and airs for soprano, tenor, and bass, a duet for sopranos, and no fewer than six choruses, and the scoring is occasionally somewhat elaborate, and severely taxes the powers both of the choir and the organist. With a few trifling exceptions the singing was admirable. Mr. W. Mulineux, F.C.O., officiated as organist and director of the choir. The anthem during the offertory was "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," from Gounod's "Redemption."

MOULSHAM.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at Moulsham Church on Sunday last. The church had been tastefully decorated. The service was commenced with the stirring hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come," in which the congregation joined heartily with the choir. The musical portion of the service was ably rendered by the choir. The "Venite" was sung to Jones in C, for the "Te Deum" Dr. F. Iliffe's Service in A was used, and the "Jubilate" was sung to Wesley in F. Joseph Barnby's anthem, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works," was given with excellent effect, the verse parts being taken by Master Alfred Pilgrim, Messrs. G. Hayward, C. W. Barnard, and F. Hayward. An appropriate sermon enforcing the duty of thanksgiving to God was preached by the vicar from the words, "Do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by Him" (Colossians, iii. 17). In the evening, when, despite the inclemency of the weather, the church was crowded, the vicar read the prayers and the Rev. S. W. W. Wilkin and the Rev. J. A. Kershaw, head-master of Chelmsford Grammar School, the lessons. Sir John Goss's anthem, "I will magnify thee, O God, my king," was sung with care and precision. The psalms were sung to Hy. Smart in G and Lemon in G, the "Cantate" to Dr. Stainer's fine double chant in C, composed for Chelmsford Choral Festival in 1882, and the "Deus Misereatur" to a very pleasing double chant in B flat, composed for the occasion by Mr. A. G. Barnard, the organist. At the close of the Service Helmore's "Te Deum" in E flat was sung. Mr. Barnard, the organist, who efficiently accompanied the singing, played the following voluntaries:—Pastorale in G (Henry Smart), march in G (Henry Smart), Andante cantabile (Gustav Hermann); chorus, "Quoniam tu solus" in C from Haydn's 2nd Mass.

WATFORD.—On Friday evening, the 12th inst., the annual Harvest Thanksgiving was held in St. Andrew's Church, and more than usual interest was imparted to the occasion by the opening of the new organ built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, in accordance with a specification prepared by Mr. James Turpin, Mus.Bac., the organist at the church. The music in the service comprised Proper Psalms to Chants by Tarton, Turle, and Humphreys, an evening service especially composed for the occasion by Mr. James Turpin, and the anthem "Fear not, O land" by Goss. After the service, Mr. James Turpin played a selection of pieces showing the excellent qualities of the organ, to the large congregation which filled the church, and who were evidently interested in the newly acquired instrument, which will be the means of enhancing the services of the church. The rendering of the vocal part of the services by the choir was excellent, showing devotional earnestness and careful attention to the requirements of the music selected, which were of a sufficiently exacting type to thoroughly test the choir. The whole service gave the utmost satisfaction.

BEDDINGTON, SURREY.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services at the beautiful Parish Church of Carew notoriety (which by the way, is one of the most noted for its highly decorated and unique interior), were held on Sunday, Oct. 14th. As usual at each service, immense congregations assembled. The excellent choir the church possesses was heard at its best, both at the morning and evening services. At the latter, the anthem was Spohr's "God, Thou art great," and after the sermon Handel's duet "O lovely peace," and "Hallelujah, Amen," from "Judas Maccabeus," was performed. The principal treble at the evening service was Master H. A. Burry, of St. Paul's Cathedral, who is the son of the organist of Beddington. Mr. Burry's services in the post of organist and choirmaster at this church date back some eighteen years, and at that time the musical part of the service was rendered in the most primitive style; the Rev. Canon Bridges, the rector, having during that time, by his munificence, added to everything that is beautiful in the church and its services.

The Owl Club gave their opening concert on Oct. 15th, at the Cannon-street Hotel, thus inaugurating their tenth season.

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

ART DEPARTMENT.

The following abstract version of the paper on "What constitutes a 'School of Music,' and how far can the formation of an English School be encouraged?" By the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus.Bac., F.R.A.S., Warden of Trinity College, London, will be found interesting:—The author, after referring to the variety of senses in which the term "school" is commonly employed, trusted his hearers would at least agree to define "a school" as the creation of a group of artists whose work possessed in common some distinctive characteristic. This distinctiveness might lie either (1) in the kind of subject chosen, or (2) in the mode of treatment adopted, or again (3) in a subtle aroma pervading all, no matter what the class of subject or the mode of treatment. Any special cult of the first mentioned order would be essentially narrow, because necessarily exclusive. A school of the second description would be less restricted as to subject, but still fettered by forms. But if we apprehend a School of Music as comprising every kind of work, and at the same time possessing the nameless but unmistakable quality imperfectly defined as a "subtle aroma," our art horizon at once expanded on all sides, and we felt it could enclose nothing less than a complete world. In speaking, therefore, of an "English School of Music," we should regard it not as characterised by more or less rigid adherence to some system of treatment, still less to any one branch of composition, but as covering the whole field of art work, and at the same time setting its distinctive mark on everything which its hand had touched, so that all men might say of it "this is English work." In former times nationality was necessarily far more marked than it could be now. The difference between the Dutch School of painters and the Italian was not merely one of method, but of ideal. The former with its fruit and vegetables aimed at literalness; the Italian School had a higher, because a more poetical, ideal, appealing as it did to imagination and emotion. But now-a-days people travelled more, saw and heard more. With wider knowledge the mind expanded, and the greater the intellectual environment the more lofty would be the ideal. The musical student of this and other nations is early familiarised with all the "schools," and his efforts may be moulded in this or that cast according to his predilections. Nevertheless his nationality would assert itself in his works, and his genius, if he possess it, would individualise all he wrote. The conception of a lofty ideal, and the power to reach it by one way or another, could not and should not be the monopoly of any one small section of the human race. If therefore we were led to see that the development of an isolated and exclusive school of music was not only under present conditions impracticable, but also unworthy of the catholicity of all true art, we should rise to a higher view of the subject and ask, how can England best contribute to the future literature of the one common language of mankind? It might serve to clear the ground a little if we summarised our musical past. While rendering all homage to our great musicians, we must admit that there is not one amongst them of whom we can declare that he has given to the world a new revelation. And in making such an admission our national pride need not suffer; we should only look with fuller assurance to the future. Already there were abundant signs that after long years of lethargy, and consequent musical stagnation, new life was beginning to stir in old England. For many years past the Royal Academy of Music had given to the nation a splendid race of teachers. Our cathedrals had not only supplied some of our greatest composers, but had really kept the art of music alive during long periods of utter apathy. Within recent times the work of the older bodies had ripened into the foundation of the College of Organists with its well-devised and carefully executed scheme of examinations; of Trinity College, London, with its teaching staff of some fifty professors, and its higher and local examinations resorted to by over 5,000 candidates annually; of the Guildhall School of Music, which owed its existence to, and was well subsidised by, the Corporation of London; and last, but by no means least, of the Royal College of Music with its numerous free scholarships for the encouragement and support of able and deserving English students. Yet, although this systematic seed sowing was indispensable as a preliminary, far more was needed to develope our

Digitized by Google

English School of Music. We must give greater opportunities to our young musicians. At present they are compelled to spend their whole time in teaching for a livelihood. The long-established endowments of learning had recently been supplemented by aids to scientific research, in all which it had been recognised that ability must have free play in a certain amount of assured leisure. Some such provision should be made for our composers—a scheme of fellowships, or, perhaps, something more akin to the Prix de Rome. Another means of encouragement would undoubtedly be the formation of an Academy of Musicians upon the lines of the Royal Academy of Arts, or the Royal Society of London—a body into which a composer who had "made his mark" could be "co-opted" by his brethren. Lastly, while placing the greatest value on sound scholarship and the study of the classical models of musical structure, let us hesitate to pounce down upon our young composers for any variation from established lines, at least until we have assured ourselves that it is a deterioration, lest we should incur the responsibility of obstructing the progress of the highest art the world can ever know.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

A correspondent of the Detroit, Every Saturday, thus writes of music in New York, and says of that city:—"It has the reputation of sustaining with no unsparing hand whatever is meritorious and ennobling in the divine art. Being the landing-place, so to speak, of the finest European talent and the centre from which ability of the highest order radiates in every direction, the material for perfecting every species of musical organization is complete indeed. That the German element, present as it is in so large a force in New York, is entitled to much of the credit which the city everywhere gets for its music is the deserved acknowledgment of a simple fact. In orchestral and piano playing the Teuton is everything, while the Englishman seems to carry off the palm in all that is meritorious in organ performances. Neither the churches nor the theatres appear at their best just now, but the music I have listened to at the new R. C. cathedral on Fifth avenue, under Dr. Peche; at Old Trinity, Broadway, under Mr. A. H. Messiter, and at Trinity chapel, Madison Square, (at which church Mr. W. B. Gilbert, Mus. Bac., Oxon, and the compiler of one of the finest hymnals with music ever presented to the Episcopal church in America, is the organist and choir-master) was very excellent. The services both at Old Trinity and Trinity chapel are so soul-inspiring as to make one feel all the better for attending them. The boy choisters at Trinity are, I am informed, well paid, chorus singers receiving $300, while soloists are paid as much as $500 and $600 a year. Trinity Church Corporation believes the organist as well as the minister to be worthy of his hire, and pays the "man on the bench" almost as many thousands as hundreds of dollars fall to the lot of some "poor hirelings." Outside of Trinity, liberal salaries are paid, in a few instances only, to several organists, but the majority of performers are so poorly paid, and their tenure of office so thoroughly dependent upon the caprices of too many church musical nobodies, that sterling organists and musicians fight shy of church positions altogether. That such a state of things should exist in a community where church millionaires can be counted by the hundreds, and where the parson who "draws" receives salary enough to run a "monetary institution" all by himself, is discouraging, if not reprehensible in the highest degree."

To some extent a similar state of things prevails here. Still it is pleasant to find some good organists in America, commanding salaries averaging from £400 to £700 and £1,000 a year. Though it must be borne in mind that the cost of living is greater in America in some directions than in England.

Messrs. G. Sims and F. Clay are engaged upon another new opera.

On Tuesday, Oct. 16th, there was an important sale of musical instruments, including pianofortes, harmoniums, a 2-manual chamber organ, double-action harps, Italian and other violins, violas, violoncellos, and double basses, wind instruments, etc., etc., and also a small library of music, at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's establishment.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1883.

ON THE ORIGIN OF A FAMOUS TUNE.

RECENTLY the story of the air so charmingly varied by HANDEL in a suite de pièces and known as the, most probably mythical, "Harmonious Blacksmith," has attracted attention. Without being in the position of being able to add to the stores of evidence already presented, I wish merely to offer what may tend to induce the reader to either accept or decline the hypothesis that HANDEL really did adopt—great men do not steal but adopt, says a German writer—the melody forming the theme of the movement in question. To accuse a man of a plagiarism merely because he employs accepted and floating musical idioms is obviously unjust; but when the general outline of a melody is followed, there seems primâ facie cause to believe that the composer accused of borrowing had seen or heard a musical construction which he consciously or unconsciously repeats. The man who uses similar bricks to those employed by another would not be judged thereby, but a man who builds his house something after a previously adopted plan may be fairly accused of some kind of pre-knowledge which he has taken advantage of, more or less unfairly perhaps. I have looked through a copy of "Les Psaulmes de David, "mis en rime Françoise per CLEMENT MAROT et "THEODORE DE BEZE," printed in Paris in 1662, and here give the melody to the 150th Psalm which forms the basis of the statement regarding HANDEL's adopted melody. This Psalm, there is evidence to show, was put into metre by MAROT in Geneva in 1543; the year before his death and several years before BEZA's visit to the headquarters of Calvinism. How soon after the music was adapted to the words I am unable to show. The tune is as follows:—

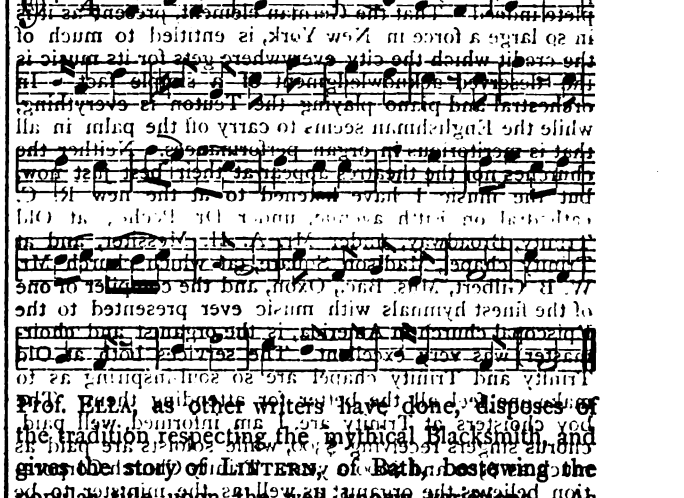
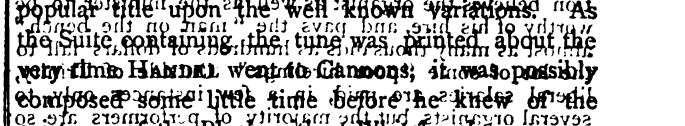
This is printed in the diamond shape notes of the period; the dots denote cadence points, and the natural was not in the original, as that sign was not then in general use if invented, but is here introduced, as there is internal evidence in the book to show that the cadence rising by one degree was taken [illegible] in our days. Perhaps the matter is [illegible] home to HANDEL, in the process [illegible] French metrical version of the Psalms was [illegible] in the Dutch and German Lutheran Churches. [illegible] taken copy I have, entitled "Psalmen Des "Propheten DAVID," rendered from the French version in corresponding Dutch metre by PETRUM DATHENUM, the music edited by a musician, one CORNELIS DE LEEUW, and printed at Schiedam in 1686, the above melody is given note for note. Now, it is conceivable that HANDEL might know and even be familiar with this tune, in consequence of its prevailing use in Protestant Germany. He might remodel it, or build his own version upon a half-forgotten recollection of the church tune he knew in his early days; or it is possible the tune itself had undergone revision and modification before he knew it, in such way as to bring it nearer his own treatment. The advance of the tune to a condition of greater rhythmical shapeliness would yield interesting matter for study. The compression and alteration into the dominant cadence of the first part, the repetition and extension of figures, the omission of a note to secure a dominant half cadence, and some slight changes towards the last cadence would be interesting features of such development.

Many of the plain song and other traditional melodies have undergone such transformations; and such tunes have in process of time lost something of their character by the subtraction of some of their conjunct intervals, peculiar to the plain chant and earlier contrapuntal ages, and have assumed bolder forms with the presence of more disjunct intervals. Such appears to have been the case with the original outline of the theme of the so-called Harmonious Blacksmith. CLEMENT MAROT's melody; possibly not the original itself, but an adaptation from plain song, was first wedded to his words at an earlier period than the date of the book I copy it from. Mr. WILLIAM CHAPPELL says, in a letter addressed to Professor J. Ella, that it was first published in 1565 by BALLARD in a collection of French chansons. It may be that this book was really the metrical Psalms, or that the version named by Mr. W. Chappell was another adaptation of a traditional tune. Prof. ELLA went into the question now being discussed in 1865, printing the version of the French song, given first in the Records of the Musical Union in 1862, and again in 1865, from the copy harmonised by WEKERLIN and printed in Paris by Farrenc in "Echos du Temps passé," to the words, "Pris ne suis ce que j'ai été." This version runs thus:



Prof. ELLA, as other writers have done, disposes of the tradition respecting the Harmonious Blacksmith and gives the story of LINTERN, of Bath, bestowing the popular title upon the well known variations. As the Suite containing the tune was printed about the very time HANDEL went to Cannons, it was possibly composed some little time before he knew of the existence of the Blacksmith's Welsh church.

Curiously enough, there is a plain song tune still in use in France to the Hyma, "Sæpe dum Christi populus cruentus," which leads off thus:—



A striking resemblance to the second portion of the theme now in question, but most probably, however, only another proof of the universality of tune particles. It is, nevertheless, an interesting fragment as being French, and as indicating the presence in France of another possible basis of the traditional theme. Several developments of the old Psalm tune first appearing to CLEMENT MAROT's words could doubtless be traced. I seem to recollect seeing one somewhere, but unfortunately cannot verify my impressions. As the Dutch version of the tune was probably used soon after the National Synod in 1618—

1619, it may be presumed that the French version with the corresponding notes was known to the Swiss Calvinists and the French Huguenots some time before the close of the sixteenth century. Mr. Rockstro, in his life of Handel, prudently declines to pronounce finally in this matter. I venture no more than to point out observations personally made. There might be some interest in an attempt to trace the use of the tune in the German Lutheran Church about the beginning of the eighteenth century; to track down any changes made in the outline of the melody, and to point a decided knowledge of Handel's acquaintance with it in his youth. Then there would indeed be some sort of solid ground for the assertion that the French tune was, as a half remembered association of his younger days or as a distinctly remembered and deliberately improved melody, the real basis of the world famous air, so dexterously set with "doubles," or variations in the first of the two sets of "Suites de Pieces," the two sets being first printed respectively in 1720 and in 1733.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

Third Series.

XV.

There is one matter calling for consideration before leaving the ordinary domains of counterpoint, as exemplified in the four-part score; this is the character of the canto fermo. As an institution, this is nearly always set in semibreves or in dotted semibreves when the counterpoint is in triple measure. Again it is usually purely diatonic, and almost invariably,—following the ancient method of approaching the final note of a mode from the second above—ends by falling from the supertonic to the tonic. Now it is surely time to consider whether it is wise to confine the student to such a restricted, stiffly set form of canto fermo, which, in consequence of its very confined methods of formation, has rarely any tuneful grace and withal can rarely be described as a melody. It is to be feared too, that theorists have got into the way of writing canti fermi very mechanically from the not unnatural idea, that rigidly set out forms are not intended to be spontaneous or tuneful productions. When the student comes to the fugue however, he is expected to compose subjects of a well-marked character, which from their well-distributed figures—in parts formulated upon given well-marked uses of different time values, which at all points arrest the ear of the listener on the qui vive for subject entrances. Now, one cannot but think the confinement of the student through his preliminary contrapuntal training to themes of the orthodox and time-honoured canto fermo type, must not only tend to increase his impatience to escape from the trammels of the stricter forms of contrapuntal drill, but deprive him of the benefit of some experience in the manipulation of repeated melodic figures and variations of the notes forming the theme as regards their time value. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be well to employ throughout the student's contrapuntal course, not only the orthodox type of canti fermi, but also melodies as themes in which the changes, graces, and variations in the time value of the notes used impart so much character to tune. There would be good practice even in two-part writing in pitting strictly carried out counterpoints of various species against more or less ornate melodies used as canti fermi. Such drill, continued through the various contrapuntal stages in combination with a fair proportion of exercise in treating themes of the old orthodox kind, would not only furnish much useful, not to say graceful, strength in part-writing, but would decidedly supply an excellent preparation for the practice of double counterpoint and fugue. In the real business of composition the strict, uncompromising canto fermo rarely finds a place, but there are distinct and not unfrequent opportunities as in moving basses for the use of different orders of counterpoint in combination with natural, graceful, and varied melodies and harmonies.

THE AUTUMN SEASON.

The autumnal season of classical concerts may be said to begin with the admirable performances on Sydenham Hill every Saturday afternoon. The first Crystal Palace Concert took place last Saturday, and the second, to-day, will be signalized by the production of Raff's "Anthem" symphony. The scheme for the year 1883-84 has not yet come before me, but the repetition of Hector Berlioz's "Messe des Morts" promises to be one most interesting feature. Mr. Manns will recognise a room for improvement after the practical failure of last spring. The chorus must be well looked after. The "Old Reporter's" protest against the annoyance inflicted upon attentive auditors at the Crystal Palace by the noisy intrusion of late comers, and the intolerable chattering in the gallery, may be strongly backed up. The directors have issued an "order of the day" for the prevention of the nuisance, but it is not always respected. The concerts will go on until Christmas and then a suspension of some weeks ensue. The omission of all "royalty" vocal numbers would be advisable, and the length of the concert should be limited to about an hour and a half or three quarters.

Mr. Arthur Chappell will not be far behind with his Saturday and Monday "Populars;" he began last year before the usual time, to wit, at the end of October, but then Easter fell early. This year, 1883-84, a wider margin is available, for Easter does not fall until April 13th, or three weeks later than in 1883. What novelties may be expected remains to be seen. A more extensive choice of pianists, from the large host available on the continent, has already been suggested. One more point: the connoisseurs would like to hear more sonatas, and fewer of the pieces recently in fashion, however good they may be. Schubert's sonatas would be "special business" at the Monday Popular, and Mr. Halle cannot expect to appease the healthy appetite of that composer's numerous admirers with an occasional reading of No. 10 or No. 11. How is it that Dussek so seldom comes to the fore? His "Plus Ultra" and "Invocation" sonatas used to be played regularly, but they have been lying on the shelf for too many years.

Mr. BARNBY promises a good season at the Albert Hall, to begin early in November. He has been asked to perform the "Messe des Morts" and must do so. The "Redemption" of GOUNOD will be repeated as a matter of course. The "Requiem" Masses of MOZART, CHERUBINI, and VERDI, cry loudly for repetition, and some of HANDEL's more rarely heard oratorios would be the better for an "airing."

The three "RICHTER" concerts will come off within a month of this date. May they prove successful in a financial sense! They surely deserve to be.

THE LATE SIGNOR SCHIRA.

READERS will be sorry to learn that Signor FRANCESCO SCHIRA died at his London residence on Monday night. He had only recently returned from Milan, where he had completed a new comic opera. Signor SCHIRA was born at Malta in 1815, and was educated at the Milan Conservatory. In 1842 he came to London, here teaching many artists of eminence. He was successively conductor of the English opera season at the Princess's, under MADDOX; at Drury Lane (in 1844), under BUNN, and at Covent Garden. Under his direction many of the operas of BALFE, WALLACE, G. A. MACFARREN, and others were produced. For the Princess's Theatre, he wrote Mina, in 1845, and Theresa, in 1850, which were performed with Miss LOUISA PYNE in the chief parts. In 1863, his opera "Niccolo di Lapi" was produced at Her Majesty's, with PATTEN and Mdme. TREBELLI in the leading parts. His cantata, "The Lord of Burleigh," founded on TENNYSON's poem, by Mr. DESMOND RYAN, was written for the Birmingham Festival of 1873.

The lamented composer and teacher was a man of rare musical gifts. His devotion to teaching naturally led to his neglect of composition; this is, alas! a common story to tell of musical men. His rare faculty for impassioned melody, his admirable sense of proportion yet bold use of form, his intimate acquaintance with the voice, knowledge of the orchestral effects, and generally sound judgment as a writer, would, had he given more time to musical composition, produced results which could only have been anticipated by those who knew his exceptional talents. As a teacher of singing Signor SCHIRA had long held an honoured position in England; and his many pupils and many admiring friends will not forget him now. He lives here only by the memory of his works, and in the tender regard of those who claimed his friendship and recognised his great talents.

E. H. TURPIN.

Paul Viardot has returned to Paris from a successful tour in Germany and Russia.

Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's opera, "Iolanthe," is at the Grand Theatre, Leeds, last week on a return visit. The part of Phyllis is now played by Miss Esmé Lee, who acts in a charming and intelligent manner, while vocally she is fully equal to the requirements of the part. Her songs are all well received, and her pretty duet with Strephon, "None shall part us from each other," is one of the gems of the opera. Miss Fanny Harrison as the Queen, and Miss Beatrice Young as Iolanthe, are both thoroughly efficient. The choruses were all given in capital style.

SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

The first annual general meeting of this society was held in the Old Town Hall, Manchester, on a recent Saturday afternoon. There was a large attendance. Mr. J. Wrigley, M.R.A.M., occupied the chair. The treasurer (Dr. Marsden) read a report, which showed that there was a balance in hand of about £40. The following report was read by the hon. secretary (Mr. J. Dawber, of Wigan), and adopted:—

"Alone among the arts and sciences had music been left without any association regular intercourse, or co-operation of its professors and teachers. To supply this lack, the Society of Professional Musicians has been formed. The aims of the society are—(1) To bring into close contact those who, by the nature and restrictions of their quiet, unostentatious, and for the most part, solitary work, have few opportunities of joining in friendly discussion and interchange of ideas. (2). To disseminate among those holding chief influence over the spread of musical knowledge the latest and best information. (3). To consider all legislative and other proposals affecting the interests of musicians. (4). To labour earnestly and perseveringly for the full recognition of the right and place of the art as an educational power of the highest character; and (5) to establish a system of graded examinations which shall (by its obvious fairness, independence, and completeness) command the confidence of students and the respect and loyal support of all teachers. The monthly gatherings of the association have been held in various centres of large population, and it is intended to vary the place of meeting as to render them easily accessible to musicians throughout the kingdom. During the very first year of the existence of the society, abundant evidence has been supplied of the keen-felt need of such an association, and of the good that may be achieved by the friendly intercourse and united efforts of its members. Busy men—previously labouring isolated and without the aid of the ready sympathy awaiting full knowledge of their views and exertions—have been enabled to work unitedly, more hopefully, and therefore more zealously. Much progress has been made towards ridding the teaching and study of music of those non-essentials and fancies which have formed the chief impediments to real union, and in cultivating catholicy and greater breadth of purpose. The earnest thought of the members has been directed to inevitable and rapidly advancing changes and to the necessity for a united course of action in view of certain legislative probabilities. Attention has been called to the alienation from their legitimate purpose of endowments intended for the advance of musical knowledge, and efforts have been made to bring about a more systematic and thorough teaching of music in its various education departments. The question of the registration of teachers has been well considered, and much time has been occupied in preparing a better system. Finally, very considerable and self-denying labour has been bestowed in the elaboration of a scheme for annual examination of students in different localities, in all sections of theoretical and practical musical knowledge. It is proposed, that in the early summer (probably in June) of the next and each succeeding year, in Manchester and Liverpool, and in all places where such help may be desired, examinations should be held of all students of music presenting themselves, and that success should be testified by certificates of various degrees, issued under the seal of the society. For the guidance of teachers and candidates the qualifications necessary in competition for the different grades of certificates will be exactly stated as to leave no room for uncertainty as to the conditions, or as to the efficiency and openness of the inspection, which will in each centre be conducted by three selected examiners, strange to the locality, and entirely without interest in the success or failure of the candidates. For the examinations in harmony, etc., a book has been compiled (and is in course of publication) containing the questions from which (by number) a selection will be made on the very eve of each examination. This plan has been adopted (1) In order to put all candidates and tutors upon an exact equality; (2) To divest the test questions of the whims of particular teachers, or the followers of any particular school of theory; and (3) To avoid the possibility of perplexing students by placing before them (as is often done) familiar questions obscured by their vague and unfamiliar form and phraseology. The questions (from each section of which some two or three will be chosen each year) have been framed so as to avoid ambiguity, while including all essential points, and are in each chapter so numerous that far less time and trouble would be required in order properly to prepare students by thorough and honest teaching of the whole subject than to 'coach' ill-grounded candidates for probable and deserved failure. It is confidently believed that a society, showing such evidence of vitality, forbearance, and good desert, will obtain the sympathy and co-operation of musicians throughout the realm."

The following gentlemen were elected upon the council: Dr. Fisher (Blackpool), Mr. F. Dean (Lancaster), Mr. J. Marsden (Salford), Mr. J. Clafton (Oldham), and Mr. S. Myerscough (Rochdale). Dr. Marsden and Mr. Dawber were re-elected treasurer and secretary respectively. A considerable time was then devoted to the consideration of the contents of an "examination book," which is to be published for the society by Messrs. Novello and Co.

Organ News.

HAWORTH CHURCH.

Organ recitals were given in Haworth Church, on Tuesday, October 16th, by Mr. Best, of Liverpool. The programme included :—

Allegretto and Adagio Religioso, from the Symphony to the Lobgesang	Mendelssohn.
Fugue in G major	Wesley.
Adagio Solennie	Dussek.
Festal March	Best.
Legende, "La Prédication aux Oiseaux"	Liszt.
Overture, founded on the "Austrian Hymn"	Hæslinger.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. A. E. Bishop was the soloist on Saturday last. He played with much care and taste, though at times perhaps his performance wanted a little more impulse, possibly through nervousness upon a strange organ. His solos were "Offertoire sur des Noels" (Guilmant), "Fantasia and Fugue" (Merkel), an Adagio of his own, a work of much promise, printed in "English Organ Music," a Pastorale by Salomé, a very interesting introduction and Fugue by J. Raff, an "Elevation" by Guilmant, and a March by Wely. These pieces were rendered excellently with admirable care and considerable tact. Miss Ambler sang well, but nervously, her songs winning very solid compliments. Mr. W. H. Brereton sang remarkably well. One of his songs was Mr. C. T. Speer's "Sea King," a new work. Mr. Van Praag was the violinist, his solo, "Fantasia Militaire" by Leonard being admirably played and very warmly received. Mr. W. T. Best will be the organist to-night.

FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

Mr. James Loaring, F.C.O., gave an organ recital on Saturday, October 13th. The following is the programme :—

E. W. TAYLOR, New College, and Stafford.
R. M. WINN, New College, and Harborne, Birmingham.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Suppé's "Juanita" is shortly to be produced in Brussels.

The Symphony Concerts at Angers have recommenced under Mr. Gustave Lelong.

A new lady singer in Paris, Mdlle. Adler, a very young artist, is attracting attention and preparing for the opera.

M. Vidal's new prize cantata "Le Gladiateur" has been executed in Paris at the annual public séance of the Institut.

A new edition of M. Lussy's masterly work "Le Rythme Musical" is out. The book will be presently noticed.

M. Pasdeloup's concerts have recommenced. Schumann's Symphony in C is included in Sunday's programme.

The Society of the Friends of Music at Vienna have issued a spirited prospectus. Their concerts are conducted by M. Gericke.

On Sunday there was to be a grand concert in the Trocadéro. M. Guilmant was the organist. The orchestra was complete, and the choir consisted of 200 voices.

Meyerbeer's "Dinorah" has been recently well played at its first home, the Opéra Comique, Paris, under the original title "Le Pardon de Ploërmel." Six of the principals were educated at the Conservatoire, Paris.

Passing Events.

After Evensong on Sunday next at St. Margaret Pattens, there will be given a selection of sacred music under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

Bizet's "Carmen," with Mdme. Marie Roze and the Carl Rosa Company, has created an enormous success in Bristol. People are nightly turned away from the doors of the theatre.

Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" will be given at the Bow and Bromley Institute, with Mr. W. G. McNaught, the composer, taking the organ, on Oct. 30th. There will be a complete and most efficient orchestra.

The Metropolitan Opera House in New York is to be opened on the 22nd by a performance of "Faust." The staff of principals is a strong one; the orchestra will consist of 60 players, and the chorus of 80 singers.

The Manchester Athenæum Society opened their seventeenth season on Oct. 15th, under the very able direction of Dr. H. Hiles. The chief feature of the programme was Gowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden."

A lecture entitled "Why learn to Sing?" by Anthony Roskilly, Esq., has been given in connection with the new singing classes at St. James-the-Less, Victoria Park. A selection of music was performed during the entertainment.

There is a movement, inaugurated by Sir A. Sullivan, to erect in some suitable locality a memorial of some kind to the late Sir John Goss. To this end a preliminary meeting will be held at the College of Organists on Monday next, at 5.30.

Mr. F. W. Chanot, jun., will publish, early this month, his catalogue of new music for the violin. The music plates are each numbered uniformly with the numbers in the catalogue, so that ordering new copies will be a certain and easy process.

The Leeds Daily News expresses a regret that no organ solo was included in the scheme of the Festival. Dr. Spark or Mr. W. Parratt, or both gentlemen, might surely have been induced to play some organ work with orchestral accompaniment.

On Wednesday, Oct. 10th, a Grand Evening Concert was given at the Institute, Chelmsford. The artists were, Mdme. Clara West, Mrs. Sydney Barnby, Mr. H. Parkin, Mr. Lovett King, and Mr. H. Preston. The audience was numerous and appreciative.

The advertisement of a soprano French horn with a chromatic compass of 5 octaves is the last exposition of mechanical ingenuity in the invention of musical instruments. Applications concerning this novelty are to be made to E. G. Heidrich, at Breslau, Germany.

At Mr. Stedman's concert, at the Birkbeck Institution on Wednesday next, the programme will be rendered by the following admirable list of artists: Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss Polak, Miss Ellen Marchant, Mr. Arthur Oswald, M. Victor Buziau, with Mr. Stedman, and his popular choir boys.

No one appeared the other day in support of the application by the Royal Academy of Music for its licence. Several of the magistrates, however, considered that this must be due to some mistake or other. On the motion of Mr. Galsworthy, the standing orders were suspended to meet the case, and the licence was renewed.

A Vocal and Instrumental Concert was given in the Town Hall, Newbury, on Tuesday evening, Oct. 9th, in connexion with the Newbury Literary and Scientific Institution. The vocalists were Mdme. Clara West, Miss C. Wollaston, Mr. H. Parkin, and Mr. H. Prenton. Solo violinist, the Chevalier Niedzielski, buffo, and conductor, Mr. Lovett King. There was a large and appreciative audience.

On Wednesday, the 17th inst., an Evensong with instrumental accompaniment was held as part of the Harvest Festival at Allhallows Church, Southwark. The anthem was Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold," and the "Te Deum," Dykes in F. The service was well rendered by the choir, conducted by Mr. C. J. Viner, organist of St. John's, Red Lion-square, and the accompanists, and voluntaries were admirably played by Mr. F. J. Perry, organist and choir-master of the church.

Mr. James Peck, to whose courtesy those who frequented the old Sacred Harmonic Concerts were for many years indebted, solicits employment as a steward at concerts, or a copyist of music. It seems scandalous that the members of the Society have pocketed money earned by their predecessors, and have turned their old officers out into the world.—Figaro.

The prospectus of the Ealing Choral Association has been issued for the coming season, and includes some interesting and unfamiliar works, amongst which may be mentioned the Requiem for "Mignon" of Schumann, the "Schicksalslied" of Brahms, and Raff's "Morning Song." The list of artists includes Miss Thudichum, Mr. Walter Clifford and others, whilst Mr. Ralph leads the band, which with the chorus, numbers about 150. Mr. Ernest Ford is the able conductor.

The Exposition and Music Hall Building, now erecting in St Louis, will cover the entire square bounded by Olive, Thirteenth, St. Charles and Fourteenth Streets, heretofore occupied by the Missouri Park. The extreme dimensions will be three hundred and twelve by four hundred and eighty feet. The main front will be on Olive-street, and the great Exposition Hall will run east and west through the middle of the block, from Thirteenth to Fourteenth Streets. The Music Hall will be on the St. Charles-street side, away from noise and disturbances. The floorage of the building is over nine acres, of which over one-half is devoted to Exposition purposes. All of the numerous departments of an Exposition have been carefully looked after, not excepting the Art and Floral Departments. The Music Hall has two grand vestibule approaches. There are wide corridors, a hall capable of seating four thousand persons, and a stage capable of accommodating one thousand choristers and grand organ.

QUERY.

ANTHEMS.—Can any reader of the Musical Standard inform me who publishes the following anthems, and the prices of each: "Thou Judge of quick and dead" (Wesley), and "Behold, how good and pleasant" (Smart).—J. I. F.

ANCIENT MARINER.—Would any Musical Society lend, or on very low terms, or sell at a very low price, twenty-five, or even as many as fifty vocal scores of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner?" Anyone willing to do this will benefit greatly a music loving body of singers, who are, and have been for sometime, debarred from taking the work in hand, owing to the copies being so dear in price.—CONDUCTOR.

ORGAN PLAYING.—What is considered the "broad" style of organ playing? We often read of recital givers displaying a broad, vigorous style. Is it intended to mean a coarse and vulgar style, for this is the meaning of the word "broad."—IRISH ORGANIST.

Perhaps the critics, now and then, use the expression without attaching the full dictionary meaning to the words and at other times employ the phrase as a charitable way of denoting an excess of noise and unmeaning vigour.—ED. Mus. Stand.

REPLY.

ADAGIO.—The pronunciation of "Weber" is gained by sounding w as v, and the first e as a broad a, with the accent on the first syllable, thus: "Vaber." It is the genius of the English language to assimilate the pronunciation of foreign words to its own methods, still, I venture to think we should retain the original pronunciation as far as possible.—ED. Mus. Stand.

London Agency: Mr. W. H. HELE, 59, Gresham St., E.C.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

THE PROPOSED GOSS MEMORIAL.

A very influential meeting in support of the erection of some suitable monument to the memory of Sir John Goss was held at the College of Organists last Monday.

The proceedings opened by the Hon. Secretary of the College suggesting that the only preliminary course before the meeting would seem to be that of inviting the illustrious pupil and friend of the departed musician (Sir Arthur Sullivan) to preside.

This was unanimously agreed to.

Sir ARTHUR SULLIVAN, who was warmly greeted, claimed the indulgence of the meeting, as he was suffering from a throat attack, which made speaking a matter of some difficulty and pain. He pointed out, in well-chosen words, the reputation of the departed great ecclesiastical composer, saying that, like the famous architect of the metropolitan cathedral in which Sir John Goss passed most of his professional life, the musician could claim to have it said of his works, Si Monumentum quæris, circumspice, or rather audi. Sir Arthur dwelt upon the pure character of Goss's Church music, and said that some permanent memorial was called for whereby to express the esteem and admiration of his contemporaries, pupils, and fellow-workers. He therefore moved—

That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is desirable that the long and beneficial services rendered to music in this country by the late Sir John Goss, the distinguished Church composer, and the high esteem and regard in which he was uniformly held, should be publicly expressed by the erection of some suitable Memorial in St. Paul's Cathedral, where he was organist for a period of 34 years.

And he made the observation that large sums were not wanted; it was chiefly desirable that the many should be represented by small amounts.

The Chairman's proposal was seconded by Dr. J. F. BRIDGE very heartily.

This resolution was carried unanimously.

Sir G. A. MACFARREN moved—

That a Committee, consisting of the following gentlemen, with power to add to their number, be forthwith nominated, for the purpose of carrying out this design.

He recalled, in expressive words, his personal connection with Sir John Goss, and felt all would act with loving esteem to forward the proposal to so perpetuate the memory of one whose services to the art, and sweet character, so fully called for due honour. He felt also that it was important that the habitual attendants and strangers visiting St. Paul's should see a memorial to Goss. Sir G. A. Macfarren referred to the presentation of the Cambridge Doctorship to Sir J. Goss and Sir A. Sullivan.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. BARNBY, and unanimously carried.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENS moved—

That Subscriptions be invited to defray the cost of the memorial and incidental charges.

This was seconded by Mr. H. LITTLETON (Novello and Co.), and carried.

Mr. E. H. TURPIN proposed—

That Mr. W. H. Cummings be requested to act as hon. treasurer of the fund, and Mr. T. L. Southgate to undertake the duties of hon. secretary connected with the matter.

This proposal was seconded by Dr. E. J. HOPKINS, and carried forthwith unanimously.

The Rev. T. HELMORE, in proposing a vote of thanks to the Council of the College of Organists for the use of the room, &c., dwelt upon the character of Sir John Goss, and laid stress upon his prayerful and earnest attitude as a Church composer.

Mr. W. H. CUMMINGS, in seconding this vote of thanks, also recalled characteristics of the departed composer. In his remarks, he said he thought that a suitable monument in the National Cathedral would be as an example to choir boys, showing them a high standard to aim at.

Dr. J. STAINER proposed a vote of thanks to Sir Arthur Sullivan for occupying the chair. The speaker, in his remarks, dwelt also upon the career of the amiable, good man the meeting was pledged to do honour to. He recalled his personal knowledge of Sir John Goss from the time he (the speaker) was a chorister of seven years of age. He thought Sir John Goss had hardly a fault, save that he had not enough rough metal in his constitution to fully assert himself in the world. His great tenderness of character the speaker thought to be most attractive and endearing.

Dr. E. J. HOPKINS seconded the vote of thanks to the Chairman.

Sir A. S. SULLIVAN, in replying, said he felt grateful for the kind words uttered. He felt with gratitude that he had a right to call himself Sir John Goss's favourite pupil. So thoughtfully and tenderly did Sir John Goss treat him, that he could recall many lessons being given in the evening, outside the usual routine of student life. Sir A. Sullivan also pointed out that the departed composer and organist was a man of most liberal ideas, possessed of great artistic knowledge, and ahead of most of his compeers in his appreciation of new works. In conclusion, he expressed the great pleasure he had had in presiding over a meeting of so distinguished and representative a character.

A GOSS REMINISCENCE.

At the meeting held at the rooms of the College of Organists on Monday last, to consider the steps to be taken for placing a tablet in St. Paul's Cathedral to the memory of the late esteemed organist and composer Sir John Goss, the chairman, Sir Arthur Sullivan, spoke in glowing but by no means too warm terms of the affectionate regard in which that good man was held equally by his cotemporaries and by his juniors and pupils.

To know whether this feeling was extended to him throughout life, many would doubtless be interested to learn how he stood in his comparatively early days in the opinion of his seniors; and to the great esteem in which he was universally held, I, as a youthful chorister, was a witness on numerous occasions.

For some years,—in 1830 and for some time before and after that date,—I, as a Chapel Royal boy, attended the meetings of the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club, the Concentores Society, the Glee Club, the Madrigal Society, &c., for the purpose of singing the treble part of any music that might be "called," having a part for that voice. At these meetings Mr. Goss was a frequent attendant; and I well remember the cordial manner in which his unobtrusive entry into the room was invariably welcomed by such men as Sir George Smart, Attwood, Bellamy, Linley, Knyvett, Sale, Sir John Rogers, Cartwright, and any other influential musicians, singers, or patrons of the musical art who might be present.

On one of these occasions Mr. Goss's quiet humour nearly brought the performance of a glee to an abrupt termination. A "serious" glee had been "called,"—one of Spofforth's,—the sloping desk supporting the copy had been placed before Mr. Goss who was to sing one of the tenor parts, and the other singers stood around him. When they had sung the music about half way through, a tiny spider let itself down from the ceiling on to the book and commenced performing a series of extraordinary evolutions. Goss following the little creature with his little finger as it run its course up and down the score, disturbed the gravity of his colleagues quite sufficiently. Presently he had a bar's rest, when, instead of observing the customary silence, he said in a voice sufficiently loud to be heard by those immediately around him, "The glee we are singing is a Spofforth, but this spider evidently takes it for a Webbe." This was quite too much for his colleagues, who, from that point to the end, sang the "serious" glee with grinning faces and tittering voices.

What followed was equally amusing. The ever sensitive Mr. Goss, finding that his witticism had caused a much greater departure in deportment and manner from that which he thought should occur when singing a serious glee, generously volunteered to apologise to his colleagues all round, which offer of course was received with a shout, and simply led up to further pleasantries.

E. J. HOPKINS.

THE LATE CHARLES S. PACKER.

The Musical Standard of September 29th announced, with regret, the death of Mr. C. S. Packer, for many years organist of St. Mary's, Reading. The passing away of one who under happier circumstances would doubtless have done even more for art than he actually accomplished, is worthy of more notice than has been accorded him. In the hope that some friend may give us some particulars of his career (his name appears in none of of our Dictionaries, English or Foreign), I send a few extracts from my note books.

"Charles S. Packer was educated at the Royal Academy of Music, and made his mark at a pupil's concert given at the Hanover Square Rooms, December 20th, 1827, when a Scena "Basta! Basta!" from Metastasio's "Morte d'Abelle" was produced. This was described as full of talent and judgment, the accompaniments of the most masterly kind, and the harmonies, in many instances, absolutely new and highly effective. The Harmonicon (July, 1828), concludes a highly eulogistic review with these words: 'Let us indulge a hope that some munificent patron, some musical Mecænas, will take by the hand a youth who holds out the fairest promise of becoming, and that in a short time, an ornament to his art and to his country. Let him be snatched from the impending slavery of teaching—a drudgery which impairs the imaginative faculty, damps that noble ambition which alone leads to excellence, and in most cases finally extinguishes every spark of genius."

Three years later, the same journal, in reviewing another work, Scena ed tria "Crudo Ciel," refers to the former notice, and expresses regret that no singer had since brought forward that work, and goes on to remark the general neglect of native genius. I have no further memoranda available, but some one will, I trust, furnish the readers of the Musical Standard with some further particulars of an English artist whose name ought not entirely to perish from memory.

STEPHEN S. STRATTON.

SACRED MUSIC IN THE ROMAN CHURCH.

The Observatore Cattolico of Milan publishes the following article, which will be found interesting as bearing on the question of Gregorian music and on recent decisions of the Sacred Congregations of Rites concerning the Roman Church.

"To prevent all doubts as to the bearing of the Decree of April 10th, 1883, relating to the authority of the Edition of the Roman Chant, as printed by Pustet of Ratisbon and approved of by the Sacred Congregation of Rites, we think it well to reproduce the following documents,

"The first is an article published in the Review of Liturgical Music, entitled Musica Sacra, printed at Milan, as the official organ of the Italian General Association of S. Cecilia. The following is the article:—

"'We are requested to throw light upon, and to explain some words of the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites.

"'This is our opinion on the subject.

"'Firstly, That the disapproval, expressed in the above Decree, is limited to certain of the wishes expressed, and does not apply to all indiscriminately.

"'Secondly, That the Decree is not unfavourable to the study, past or future, of ancient liturgical music.

"'Thirdly, That the Decree does not in the least condemn the method of executing Plain Chant according to the method of Guido d'Arezzo.

"'Fourthly, That the Decree does not forbid the publication, and distribution of new editions, whether already made or to be made in the future, for the purpose of facilitating the historical or archæological study of Plain Chant.

"'Another very important question which has been submitted to us concerns the practical use which may now be made of the Original Chants of S. Gregory, i.e., whether by the Decree it is intended to forbid it altogether for liturgical purpose, or to allow or tolerate it in the same way as the music of Palestrina; the use of the organ and of orchestral music by composers not only modern but even unknown, is allowed, even when much longer than the original liturgical music. Certainly the chant need not fear comparison with the above-named music, either for the beauty or fitness of its liturgical melody. We therefore think there is no reason why the Holy See (after having examined and ascertained that it is genuine) should not, if it saw fit under special circumstances, allow the use of this music in the Divine offices, especially as we suppose it would be accompanied by the organ. It seems to us that it would be injurious to the Holy See to imagine that it intended to exclude entirely from Divine worship the more ornate kind of plain chant which was used with so much edification throughout the Church during so many centuries, and from which modern plain chant has come, having been simplified for the sake of convenience.'

"The above article had the approval of the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, as may be gathered from the following letter:—

"'I congratulate you on the articles published in the Bulletin Officiel for May and June. In this Decree, which you considered it your duty to publish, the Sacred Congregation has entirely confirmed its former views on the subject of plain chant.

"'Continue confidently the work which you have begun for the reformation of Church music, for it is truly desirable. As I said to you on a former occasion, there are two ways of doing this, viz., the study of Palestrina's music, so eminently ecclesiastical, and of music with an accompaniment for the organ or orchestra, after the manner of the compositions of the great masters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. There are few places where Palestrina's music is properly executed; and as far as I know, it can best be heard in the Papal Chapel and in Ratisbon Cathedral. The rareness with which it is heard may be attributed to the heavy expenses which its execution entails and the want of the necessary trained voices. To escape this last difficulty it would be advisable to bring up young men carefully, as Palestrina did in his day. We have an example of this in the Gregorian capella All' Anima, which you helped to found, and where carefully taught youths execute Palestrina's sublime compositions with great effect.

"'But the Italian ear, too much accustomed to the sounds of the organ, feels no pleasure in the beautiful harmonies of Palestrina when unaccompanid by instrumental music, whilst to the true lover of music the effect is wonderful. The ordinary run of hearers, unacquainted with the art, think that these beautiful compositions—echoes of the melodies of Paradise—are only a confusion of voices. Hence, if Palestrina's music were much used, there would be a danger that the faithful, generally unable to appreciate what is sublime, would not attend services where music was used which would not be fortunate enough to please them. But when the organ is used, the music is more pleasing as a rule, and becomes almost enchanting when it is accompanied by other instruments. This kind of music was customary among the Jews, as the pages of the Old Testament bear witness; and the Psalms were sung in the Temple to the accompaniment of instruments.

"'The compositions of Haydn, and the Masses of Mozart, of Cherubini, and of others, are choice and serious compositions, and are far from being unbecoming to the holiness of the Church.

"'To avoid contradictions, we ought to abstain from blaming composers, but ought to invite them courteously to imitate the style of the masterpieces we possess. I am convinced that with good management and the periodical publishing of the music of Palestrina with organ accompaniment, the desired reform would gradually take place.

"'In the above sense, I am ready to give your plans the support you think necessary, &c.

"'D. CARD. BARTOLINI.

"'Rome, 15th July, 1883.

"'To M. le Profeseur, Guerrino Amelli,

"'Vice-Librarian of the Ambrosian Library, Milan.'"

The above liberal letter shows a healthy feeling against the too narrow tendency on all sides to check the progress of ecclesiastical music.

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

On Saturday last the leading feature in the programme was Raff's "Autumn" symphony. As is well known, the ideas of each of the four seasons have been embodied by him in a series of four symphonies, of which the three first are now already known to us, the fourth, "Winter," still remaining to be performed. The "Autumn" symphony, of which we now speak, is divided into four movements, and a heading at the top makes known to us the ideas which it is intended to depict in each of these. An analogy is to be discerned between these ideas and those of the earlier symphonies which would doubtless appear more strongly if we could hear them all performed in close succession, when we should doubtless find that they are intended to constitute an organic whole. The style is a mixture of the "New German School," with the old classical. Although most of Raff's symphonies, including the present one, contain much of what is called "programme music," yet he does not forsake the old traditional lines; in fact, the ancients themselves, with all their glorious laws and contrivances of counterpoint, have perhaps never used them so advantageously as he does.

The "Autumn" symphony was an undoubted success, and was received with unbounded applause, both by the general audience and by the connoisseurs who were present in great force. There are, nevertheless, weak points in it, which ought not to be passed over. The scenes described and depicted sometimes border very closely on the ridiculous. The rattling of dead men's bones by the violins playing col legno—striking with the back of the bow—and the yelping of the hounds by the piercing high notes of the same instrument, cannot but provoke a smile. Our feelings were also appealed to in the first movement by the heading, "feelings and impressions." Now, let us compare this style of writing with the spirit of the greatest master of symphony. "In the 'Eroica,' the C minor, A major, and the Choral, we see a noble character struggling with adversity, surmounting all obstacles and breaking forth from bondage to liberty, out of darkness into light; sometimes through the changing scenes of happiness and sorrow to the sublimest visions of bliss." Surely this was a grander idea to work out than most of those depicted in the modern programme music.

That Raff, like Berlioz, was a perfect master of all the resources of the orchestra there can be no doubt, and his effects are always telling and often very lovely. Take, for instance, the third movement called the "Elegy," which is full of melody of the most charming kind, given to the most sympathetic instruments—here the combinations for the wood-wind are of the loveliest description. From first to last, the work is indeed most interesting, and often very beautiful, and in every passage we see the hand of a master and a genius.

Beethoven's E flat Concerto was played with commendable success by Mdme. Helen Hopekirk, and was much applauded. Mr. Turner, who sang in the place of Mr. Maas, gave much pleasure in his songs. R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

I agree in the main with the critic of the Daily Telegraph respecting Raff's "Autumn" symphony, of which the doctor must give details. It is not a great work, and in nowise suggestive of autumn on the "programme music" theory. Raff, as our contemporary remarks, had evidently fallen into the "sere and yellow leaf" himself, and worked out his mine. After "Leonora" the symphony sounds weak; but I must admit that it is not uninteresting or untuneful. The "long-drawn out" melody of the first movement, in A flat, for violin and flute, struck me as very pretty. The "Dance of Phantoms," in A minor, bids fair to take the popular ear, it's a trifle tricksy; the trio for three flutes is a good point, and indicative of the actual meaning of the term "trio" in this department of the art. The "Elegy" in C sharp minor and major, a sort of "song without words," is too long. Raff enunciates the theme equivocally, and suggests E major, until a B sharp in the bass asserts the relative minor; an enharmonic change occurs in a "complement," from A flat to G sharp; the movement closes in the tonic major. "The Hunt" is commonplace stuff, and not new; the trumpet call at the close is ineffective as a climax. Musicians would notice the non-relation of the keys in the various movements; the first and the final correspond "relatively," but the composer elsewhere changes from F minor to A minor, and from A minor to C sharp minor. Raff uses the B flat clarinet in the first and last movements, so as to "read" in B flat and G; in the "Dance of Phantoms" and the "Elegy" the A clarinet comes into play, so as to "read" in C and G.

Mdme. Helen Hopekirk has received, and deservedly, full homage for her reading of Beethoven's 5th Concerto. I am happy to endorse other golden opinions. Sir George Macfarren's Symphony in E minor (first time) will be a bonne bouche for this (Saturday) afternoon. By the way, the overture to "Zauberflote" was taken at much too great a pace. A. M.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

Last Tuesday, in commemoration of Liszt's birthday, a recital of some of his pianoforte compositions was presented by Mr. Bache before a large audience at St. James's Hall. The programme included:—

Sarabande and Chaconne. (From Handel's Singspiel "Almira").
Études de Concert, Nos. 1 and 3. (Dedicated to E. Liszt).
Sonata B minor. (Dedicated to Schumann).
"Bénédiction de Dieu dans la Solitude."
Rhapsodie Hongroise. No. XI.
Ungarischer Sturme Marsch. (Edition of 1876).

Liszt's "Loreley" was sung by Miss Ambler, after the sonatas to Mr. Bache's artistic rendering of the accompaniment. This refined, delicious tone picture (more elegant, to my mind, in its simple pianoforte dress than with orchestral accompaniment), was somewhat beyond the powers, physical and mental, of the lady, who, nevertheless, possesses some attractive, though undeveloped, qualities.

A more varied programme than the above from the works of any one man could by no possibility be arranged, and Mr. Bache had the reward of discretion and good taste by retaining the attention of most of his audience from the first note to the last. The interest naturally centred round the Sonata, but the variety produced by the song and the lighter pieces following prevented one from feeling that the object of the day was over when the Sonata had been heard. The "Bénédiction de Dieu" is a most entrancing flow of melody; rarely has such a long, restful strain touched the heart of a poet!

"D'où me vient, O mon Dieu, cette paix qui m'inonde?
D'où me vient cette foi dont mon cœur surabonde?"

These are the lines of Lamartine that the musician has chosen as a motto, and nobly (yet how simply and gracefully!) illustrated.

"C. A. B.'s" able analysis of the Sonata was given with the programmes, as on a former occasion. Mr. Bache is anxious that others, like himself, should understand the musician, as whose prophet in this country he has fully established his claim to be accepted; he does not wish them either blindly to worship, or ignorantly to condemn. Mr. Bache has, in a remarkable degree, made this noble work his own. One feels as if it were the author himself to whose interpretation one is listening; so earnestly, so lovingly, and with such firm faith, is every detail set forth. This complete self-identification with the writings of another is a power second in importance only to the highest creative genius. Those who do not appreciate Liszt through Mr. Bache's reading of his works will certainly never learn to appreciate them through any other interpreter; their only chance will be by a quiet and conscientious study of them at their own piano.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

A new Communion Service by Mr. Warwick Jordan, will be sung at St. Stephen's, Lewisham, at the 11.45 morning Service, on Sunday week, the 4th prox. In addition to the organ accompaniment, special parts are written for trumpet and trombone.

MR. J. B. BONAWITZ'S "HISTORICAL RECITALS."

Mr. J. B. Bonawitz began his four "Historical Recitals of Pianoforte Music" on Wednesday evening, Oct. 17th, at the Bluthner Rooms, Kensington Gardens Square. These recitals should be attended by all who desire to cultivate a fine taste, and to be "well read" in the literature of the pianoforte. Mr. Bonawitz does not utter one word as a regular "lecturer" would, but he so faithfully and so eloquently expounds his elegant extracts as sufficiently to inform those who, having ears, will to hear, and what is more, to bear in mind the impressions received. The scheme of this first recital deserves to be specified. The numbers were as follows: Canzona in G minor (Frescobaldi), (1591-1654); Gigue in B flat major (Muffat), (1650-1702); Fugue in D major (Bach), (1685-1750); Suite in G minor (Handel), (1685-1759); Fantasia, in C minor (Mozart), (1756-1791); Sonata, Op. 27, "Moonlight" (Beethoven), (1770-1827); Andantino from the Sonata in A major, No. 10 (Schubert), (1797-1828); Caprice, in E minor (Mendelssohn), (1809-1847); Nachtstuck, in F major (Schumann), (1810-1856); Fughetta in G minor (Schumann), (1810-1856); Nocturne, in F minor (Chopin), (1809-1849); and Scherzo, in B flat minor (Chopin). So much for deceased writers. The works of living composers were: "Preghiera" (Rubinstein); Spring melody (Agnes Zimmermann); "Yellow Jasmine" (from the "Language of Flowers") (F. H. Cowen); Tarantelle (Immanuel Liebich); Albumblatt (Theodore Kirchner), and the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Liszt). The names of the above composers (two excepted), are familiar to educated persons; the notice is not written for the non-musical. The gigue of Muffat and Bach's fugue sensibly stirred the audience, and Mozart's Fantasia or "quasi-sonata" excited a furore; in Mr. Bonawitz's hands the work fully asserted its power and meaning. The second movement from Schubert's 10th sonata—(there is a shorter and slighter one of earlier date in the same key)—might have moved a marble Niobe. How remarkable in this piece, as in the fragmentary Symphony No. 8 (B minor), the alternation of melting pathos with fierce and stormy outbursts of impatient rage! Schumann's little "Fughetta" is a gem, too short by half; it ought to have been encored. The living composers were worthily represented. Rubinstein's "Prayer" in B flat has all the devotional fervour of its subject; Miss Zimmermann's "Melody," in the bright key of D major, made one sigh to think that it was the season of the "sere and yellow leaf." Mr. Cowen's sweet floweret, odoriferous in an analogous sense, diffused its fragrance through the room, and Herr Liebich's spirited Tarantelle in B flat minor, will no doubt, induce some visits of ladies to the well-stored librairie of Messrs. Augener & Co. The Abbé Liszt concluded the soirée with a crashing climax. Mr. Bonawitz played with intense energy and marvellous versatility, for nearly two hours, and was rewarded with frequent demonstrations of approval and admiration. The next recital is fixed for Nov. 7th.

LEEDS.

A People's Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Saturday evening, before a crowded audience. A special feature of the concert was the exquisite violin playing of Mr. Bernhardt Carrodus (a son of Mr. J. T. Carrodus), who made his first appearance before a Leeds audience. This young gentleman played Vieuxtemp's "Air Varie in D," which being encored, he gave a piece from Gounod; and in the second part of the programme, De Beriot's "Scène de Ballet," all played with great taste and skill, to the evident delight of the audience. A new song of Dr. Spark's entitled "Life," composed for and dedicated to Madame Valleria, was efficiently sung by Miss Bristow. The song is a composition of great merit and was encored. Another interesting item was the unaccompanied chorus from Macfarren's new oratorio "King David," "Remember not, Lord." This was sung as a quartet by Miss Bristow, and three members of the Leeds Arion Octet, and was given in a most impressive manner. Miss Bristow also sang "Hear ye, Israel" from the "Elijah," and one or two other pieces, all being given in excellent style. The remaining soloists were Messrs. Northrop, Vernon Williams, and D. Billington, and the members of the Leeds Arion Octet sang a couple of glees in a manner that showed very careful training. Mr. J. P. Bowling played the pianoforte accompaniments, and Dr. Spark ably presided at the organ, and played as organ solos selections from "Lohengrin" and the overture to the opera "Martha."

RECEPTION AT KENSINGTON.

Mrs. Williams and Mdme. De la Baume held a reception last Saturday evening, Oct. 20th, in Lower Phillmore Place, Kensington. A number of professional musicians and a large corps journalistique were present. Mdlle. Lebrun, known as a pianist, but at present acting as vocalist, with a fine mezzo-soprano voice, sang with much emphasis and passion Denza's air in D, "Si tu m'aimais," ranging from low C natural to F sharp, also a MS. English song of Carlo Ducci (who conducted), entitled "'Twas not to be"; Mdlle. Lebrun's pronunciation of the (to her) foreign words was remarked with admiration by the audience. Mdlle. Lebrun afterwards sang, with Signor Ria, a favourite tenor des salons, the duet in G, from "Il Trovatore," between Manrico and his gipsy mother. Signor Ria, in finest voice, sang for solos "Musica Proibita," taking high G at the end, and Campana's air "Mi credeva in Paradiso." Mr. Quatremayne excited a sensation by his genuine dramatic delivery of Blumenthal's song, "Across the far blue hills, Marie," where the composer, fond of modulation, makes an excursus from G (the original key) to B major. Mr. Quatremayne achieved equal success in another elaborate piece, the title of which was unfortunately not noted at the time, and is consequently forgotten. The sonorous basso, Signor Monari-Rocca, almost shook the roof with "Largo al factotum," and the stirring "gallop-along" song "Les Muletiers de Calabre," one of his specialités. Miss Davey sang Donizetti's air "E morta" in E minor and major, holding finely the high G and A natural that occur. An amateur young lady, who sang an English ballad out of tune, and in the worst style, is only referred to as a caution against the impertinent intrusion of utterly incompetent persons in the presence of eminent professionals, who can only pity them and pass by. The audience and the reporter were sorely disappointed not to hear the young American soprano, Miss Griswold, disabled by hoarseness. This charming cantatrice is likely, if allowed an opportunity, to achieve great success on the stage of lyrical theatres, and her personal appearance must always command the "sympathy" of a large audience. Signor Carlo Ducci, who conducted the concert, played some pretty solos on the pianoforte, inclusive of a characteristic gipsy air, "Tziganeska," in E minor and common time. This is published. The MS. English song should also be handed to the engraver forthwith.

CHRIST CHURCH, WOBURN SQUARE.

On Oct. 18th the annual festival and harvest thanksgiving service was held. The different local choirs, St. Giles in the Fields, St. George, Bloomsbury, Christ Church, &c., formed a body some seventy strong. The service was W. G. Wood's effective Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F. The anthems were E. H. Turpin's "Thou Visitest the Earth" and Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus. The whole of the music was carefully and excellently rendered. Mr. W. G. Wood presided most ably at the organ, and Mr. E. H. Turpin conducted. A large congregation attended the service.

WANDSWORTH.

At the Wandsworth Town Hall on the 18th inst., an evening concert was given, when the following works were performed. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," commencing with the chorus "All men, all things"; in this and the succeeding one, the choir were in excellent form, and did great credit to their conductor. The soloists were Miss Perfitt, who was deservedly applauded, and Mr. J. Heald, who was also heard to advantage, rendering the tenor solos with great taste. Mrs. Farley, Mrs. O'Donoghue, Messrs. Minot and Furmage, sang the quartet "I waited for the Lord," and Mrs. O'Donoghue and Mr. Garratt the duet "My song shall be always thy Mercy," in a pleasing manner. A sacred cantata "Babylon's Wave," by E. M. Flavell, first time of performance, a work shewing evidence of power, was well received, the soprano solo sung by Miss Perfitt being encored. The second part of the programme consisted of a pianoforte solo, Polonaise in A flat (Chopin), by Miss Rozel Ayers, another cantata by E. M. Flavell (words by P. J. Brebner), "The Fairy King," (soloists, Misses Perfitt, Coyte Turner, Fincham, and Messrs. Garratt and Hodges), and miscellaneous selections.

The stage performance at the Crystal Palace of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful cantata, "The May Queen," proved to be a mistake, as everyone who knew the character of the music might have foretold.

BIRMINGHAM.

The musical season of Birmingham may be said to have opened with the performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," by the Philharmonic Union, on the 27th ult. The chorus, under the conductorship of Dr. Heap, did its part of the work thoroughly well, the rendering of the magnificent choral finale to the first part, "O great is the depth," sufficiently attesting the good "stamina" and training of this now fully-matured musical corps. This is the eighth series of concerts, by the way, which has now been entered upon; and the perfect efficiency of the chorus reflects the utmost credit upon the worthy conductor, who has held his post from the birth of the institution up to the present time. The soloists on this occasion were Misses Clara Samuell and Dones, and Messrs. Kenningham and Blower. The first-named artist sang her beautiful opening solo, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets," in a manner truly charming, as indeed the whole of her music; of the other vocalists it need only be said of them that their efforts were satisfactory in their respective departments, though Mr. Blower, by his display of an upper F sharp, without sufficient authority, incurred the displeasure of some. There are some passages, certainly, in which the logical conduct of a melody demands the higher note instead of its octave below, which it seems the composer must have written in order to spare the voice. Where this is obviously the case, no one, I am of opinion, need stickle at a slight change of the kind. It is different where the melody is affected characteristically, to suit the singer and his "top-note." That many evils are likely to creep in if points such as this are left to the discretion of the vocalist, there can be no doubt; and as I have no wish to incur a charge of heterodoxy and want of respect for the "classics" simply to shield Mr. Blower, I will leave the point open to general question. The alteration made was in the aria, "O God, have mercy;" the three notes D, F sharp, and E before the first double bar may or may not seem to allow of being sung in the upper octave. The question is not whether such alterations should be deprecated "on principle," but whether it is possible to distinguish such passages where the composer has only been deterred, for practical reasons, from writing a note in the upper range of the voice. If the latter is possible, such alterations would, instead of mutilating the strain, simply restore the original and obvious intention of the composer.

On the same evening (Thursday) of the week following, the Festival Choral Society gave a performance of the same oratorio. Under the conductorship of Mr. Stockley, the work went, of course, admirably. Whatever is undertaken by this Society is done, as a general rule, perfectly. There was a little shortcoming last season, but that may have been owing to the strain of the festival performances. It would be unprofitable, apart from the question of bad taste, to institute comparisons between this performance and that of the week previous. It may be said, without offence, however, that the voices in the older society are a little better balanced. In Dr. Heap's choir the alto section seemed, to my thinking, rather weak. The soloists, on this occasion, were certainly sans reproche—Mesdames Anna Williams and Enriquez, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Ludwig. After such a lapse, two performances of "St. Paul," so very close together, was, perhaps, not an event unacceptable to some. I doubt whether the two societies intended this rivalry.

The first concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute took place on the 6th inst. The programme (wholly orchestral) included Bennett's lovely Symphony in G minor. We have had no greater treat for some time than was afforded by the performance of this work. Messrs. Ward and Abbott played Spohr's Duo Concertante for two violins (Op. 88). This is the piece I mentioned some time ago when it was first played by these two clever artists at a concert given by Mr. Stockley. It went excellently well. The Andante (from unfinished Symphony) of Schubert, and the overtures to "Athalie" and "Ruins of Athens," together with the "Turkish March," belonging to Beethoven's work, were the other items of the programme.

Mr. Stratton's first concert of the present series took place on the 16th inst. The principal work performed was the Piano Quintet of Herman Goetz (Op. 16). Though new to the performers as well as the audience, the work altogether received a worthy rendering, and was most appreciatively received. Mr. Cowen's early Trio in C minor, for piano, violin, and 'cello, was welcome as an interesting specimen of the work, though immatured as yet, of this elegant composer, who has not at present forsworn his nationality. Haydn's well-known Quartet (Strong's) in D (Op. 64) was excellently rendered by Mr. Ward and party; and the artist named took for his solo a romance, "L'Adieu," by Mr. Carrodus. Dr. Rowland Winn played an Impromptu Caprice, by Oliver A. King—not a very good selection, if intended to exhibit British art—and a Capriccio in E, by Scarlatti. In both works he did justice to his own reputation as a clever excutant, and in the concerted pieces he was, of course, "everything to be wished."

Concerts for young people are being organized in New

LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent).

Oct. 23rd.

Musical matters are getting brisk in this city. The Philharmonic Society opened its doors for the first season a fortnight ago, when the principal artists were Mr. Charles Hallé and Signor Foli, the whole under the direction of Mr. Charles Hallé the new conductor to the Society. To-night the second concert takes place, the principal artists being Madame Patey and Mr. Ludwig Straus. The concert is to be under the conductorship of Mr. Edward Hecht in consequence of (according to the advertisement) "Mr. Halle being absent owing to an engagement contracted by him prior to his appointment to the Conductorship of the Society"!! Comment is unnecessary! In any other business arrangement would such a thing be allowed? I trow not. The Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society are preparing for their campaign. The first concert is announced for November 3rd and the oratorio of "Elijah" has been selected for the opening night. Mr. Randegger will conduct and Mr. W. T. Best will be at the organ. It is also stated that there will be a full band. The works underlined for future concerts are the Messiah, and "Israel in Egypt."

Mr. Branscombe has been giving organ recitals on the fine organ in St. Margaret's Church, Princes Road.

Mr. Martin Schneider gave a recital on the organ in the Church of St. Matthew and St. James, Mossley Hill, on Saturday last. The programme will appear in the "Organ News" column next week.

GLASGOW.

Among forthcoming concerts and musical events may be mentioned the following:—A chamber concert, by Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame N. Néruda, on the 19th; a rendering of the "Creation," by the Tonic Sol-fa Association, with Madame Ilma di Murska, Mr. R. Hilton, &c., on the 25th; and, on the same day, the Glasgow Select Choir will sing Smart's "Jacob," accompanied by Messrs. Berry and Swan, Mr. Allan, as usual, conducting. Miss Agnes Liddell, of this city, gave a concert on the 16th in the Queen's Rooms, assisted by Miss Ada Earee, Mr. George Perrin, Mr. Bantock Pierpont, Mdlle. H. Lippmann, and Herr A. Gallrein; Signor Alberto Visetti conducted. Mr. J. T. Carrodus will appear at the St. Andrew's Hall on Saturday the 20th.

The Glasgow Choral Union sang at the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the New Municipal Buildings on Saturday the 6th; but, being environed by bands playing, and the distracting sounds attending a congregation of many thousands, the effect was neither sublime nor audible. The programme consisted of a few psalms, the "Hallelujah" chorus, and "Rule Britannia."

An amateur orchestral society has been commenced in the west end, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Hoeck; but it is understood to be a semi-private concern. It is raised from the ruins of a former association, and has already been practising.

DERBY.

A successful amateur concert was given at St. James's Hall on October the 19th, in aid of the restoration of a local church. The performers were, almost exclusively, amateurs. Under the circumstances, severe criticism would be misplaced. The following ladies and gentlemen took part:—Lady Florence Duncombe, Mrs. Milnes, Mrs. Osborne Bateman, Mrs. Curgenven, Rev. T. F. Jones, Mr. Edward M. Wass, Rev. H. M. Willoughby, Mr. J. V. Woodward (violoncello), Rev. S. Bengough (accompanist). The vacancy caused by the absence of Miss Milnes through indisposition was kindly filled up by Mrs. Curgenven, whose rich, mellow voice, and cultured style, was shown to advantage in Gounod's pathetic setting of "Oh! that we two were maying." Lady Florence Duncombe possesses a voice of good quality, but scarcely powerful enough to tell well in so large a room. It is a matter for regret that her ladyship should not employ her talents upon better material than the two songs she chose on this occasion. Mrs. Bateman is most deservedly a favourite with a Derby audience. Perhaps the most pleasing of her contributions was the song with 'cello obbligato, although Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianza" was certainly well-rendered. The gentlemen, one and all, did excellent service. Special mention should perhaps be made of HEATON.—In connection with the annual harvest festival at St. Barnabas's Church a selection of music from "The Creation" was performed the other Saturday evening in the presence of a large congregation. The principal parts were sustained by the Rev. R. W. Easton, Miss Cockcroft, and Mr. Charlesworth Prince, whilst Mr. James Rooks, of St. Paul's, most efficiently presided at the organ. The choruses were well rendered by the choir, assisted by several members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, the whole being ably led by Mr. Alfred Padfield, the choirmaster of the church.

PRESTON.—On Saturday evening, Oct. 20th, Mr. James Tomlinson gave his usual weekly organ recital. The programme was as follows: Overture to "Lodoiska" (Cherubini), "Cuckoo and Nightingale" concerto (Handel), Fantasie (Guiraud), Overture "The Naïdes" (Sterndale Bennett), Barcarolle (Spohr), March from the 1st Suite (Lachner). The "Cuckoo and Nightingale" concerto was received with loud applause. The Fantasie was rendered with great feeling, and elicited a well merited encore, to which Mr. Tomlinson responded. The march was rendered in a spirited manner. There was a moderate attendance.—On Monday, Oct. 22nd, Mr. Norwood gave a grand military and orchestral concert in aid of the Infirmary. Signor Foli sang "The Shipwright," "The Vikings." Miss Snowden, R.A.M., a Preston lady, sang very sweetly "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Second thoughts are best," "The Lost Chord." The orchestra, consisting of 40 performers, rendered overture "William Tell," gavotte "Mignon," selections from "Carmen" and "Iolanthe," and "The British Army Quadrilles." The Gordon Highlanders' Pipers and three other military bands took part in the "Quadrilles." The concert was a success, and it is expected that the Infirmary will receive a handsome sum.

BATH.—Mr. Oliver's concert took place at the Assembly Rooms, on Friday evening, Oct. 19th, but without Mr. Sims Reeves, who pleaded illness as the reason of his absence. It was the first time that Miss Ella Lemmens had sung in Bath, and she received a cordial welcome. Her voice is a soprano, flexible, sweet in tone, and well under control. Miss De Fonblanque sang very beautifully. The songs were good, and the duets, Mozart's "Su l'Aria" with Miss Lemmens, and "Crudel Perche" with Mr. Barrington Foote, were delivered with perfect taste and finish. Mr. Barrington Foote is a great favourite here. He sang an effective composition of Mr. Herbert Reeves, "Highwayman Jack," receiving a unanimous encore. Signor Bisaccia was pianist. He played one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without words," and a brilliant "Saltarello" by Mattei; also Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," for which he received an encore. The veteran Nicholson took part in the programme. It was altogether an enjoyable entertainment. This being the first concert of the season, it may be well to mention that the entrances to the rooms, which have always been more or less gloomy, are now brilliantly lighted by three of those splendid lamps which the Council have placed in convenient positions in the city.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LIVERPOOL CENTRE.

In the small concert room of St. George's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the prizes and honour certificates gained by the candidates of the Liverpool centre at the examinations in elementary musical knowledge and in instrumental and vocal music, held in connection with Trinity College, London, were distributed by Mrs. Palgrave Simpson. The chair was taken by Mr. Palgrave Simpson, and with him on the platform there were Sir James Picton, Rev. T. Major Lester, Major R. E. Stewart, Dr. Utting, Mr. H. Grimshaw, Rev. S. Armour, Mr. Franklin Haworth, Dr. R. H. D. Johnson, Messrs. W. D. Hall, John Wrigley (Manchester), R. Burgess, A. E. Isaac, Theo. Goebbells, W. H. Maxfield (Altrincham), Higgins, H. E. Rensburg, Malcolm Guthrie, J. Sanders, G. Holden, A. W. Newell (Wigan), J. B. Mackenzie, C. K. Bryan (Southport), G. Miller, H. Kinsey, Holmes, Edwards, J. H. Kelley, H. Thornborough, J. H. W. Biggs, &c.

The local hon. secretary (Mr. J. J. Monk) intimated that letters had been received from Lord Claud Hamilton, M.P., the Rector of Liverpool, Mr. Santley, Mr. E. R. Russell, the Warden and the Registrar of the College, and others, expressing regret at their inability to be present. He afterwards read the report for the year 1882-3, stating that, for the sixth time, the annual report was presented with a favourable result. During the past year only three gained first senior honours in the United Kingdom, and one of the three is a Liverpool candidate. Out of ten candidates who gained second senior honours, one also belongs to Liverpool, and of twenty-nine gaining third senior honours, four represent the Liverpool centre. At the June theoretical examinations, the senior honour candidates complained that the paper could not be done in the time allowed (two hours); and that the matter will, in the future, not be overlooked by the examiners who set the papers. The visiting examiner, in the person of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, remains unchanged; and, on all sides, it is hoped that that arrangement will be continued in the future. It would be impossible for any visiting examiner to give more satisfaction than Mr. Stark has done, and the encomiums passed upon his method and manner of examining candidates, by both teachers and students, are a very pleasing and well-deserved feature. With regard to the examinations in instrumental and vocal music, two or three notable improvements will be introduced in the coming examinations. Certain privileges have also been accorded to candidates who have passed the senior local examinations with high honours, in entering for the higher examinations held only at the College, in London, every January and July. The best thanks of the committee are due to one of their own body, the Rev. T. Major Lester, for acting as visitor at the two examinations which were held in this room.

The CHAIRMAN, after commenting upon the satisfactory character of the report, said there had of late years been a remarkable extension of musical culture in this country.

A selection of music was next given.

Mrs. PALGRAVE SIMPSON then distributed the prizes.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

PARIS, OCT. 23rd, 1883.

The concert season opened brilliantly on Sunday, when full houses welcomed back M. Pasdeloup and M. Colonne at the Cirque and Châtelet. The programme at the Cirque was excellent, though the only novelty provided was an Andante Symphonique from the pen of M. Léon Husson, a young and rising composer. It is dramatic in character, and gives promise of better things. The influence of Wagner is evident in M. Husson's somewhat intemperate use of the brass wind instruments. Here and there the work lacks clearness; but the orchestration is, even when most pretentious, both ingenious and uncommon. I am sorry to say the andante was not received with great enthusiasm.

The pièce de résistance was Schumann's ever delightful Symphony in C major, to which succeeded (besides the andante of M. Husson), the Theme and Variations from Beethoven's Serenade for violin, alto, and violoncello, Mozart's B flat pianoforte Concerto (admirably played by M. Theodore Ritter), and Berlioz's overture to "Le Carnaval Romain." The popular chef d'orchestre had a most flattering reception.

At the rival Châtelet, M. Colonne led off with one more performance of the "Damnation de Faust," which is all I need say about the concert, except that Berlioz's masterpiece was executed as faultlessly as ever, and that, like M. Pasdeloup, the young conductor who has so often led his followers of the Association Artistique to victory was loudly applauded on stepping forward, bâton in hand, into his old place.

M. Pasdeloup's arrangements for the season promise us an excellent series of concerts. They will hardly be satisfactory, however, to the countless French composers who have works ready for production, as M. Pasdeloup announces that he intends to devote particular attention this year to the Italian and Russian Symphonists, and will, consequently, be compelled to disregard the claims of many native musicians. We are also, as usual, to be afforded opportunities of renewing our acquaintance with many old and forgotten favourites. Gluck, Rameau, and Lulli will all of them be remembered, and several long neglected pianoforte compositions of Mozart will be "revived," and represented to us by that erudite and gifted artist, M. Theodore Ritter.

It is now nearly twenty-three years since M. Pasdeloup founded the Paris Popular Concerts. Although the competition of enterprizing rivals like MM. Colonne and Lamoureux has often threatened his work with disaster, it still lives and flourishes.

After several years' absence, Mdlle. Galli-Marié, one of the most original and delightful artists on the lyric stage, will make her reappearance at the Opéra Comique, in Bizet's "Carmen." I hardly know which will be the more welcome—the work or its interpreter. Mdlle. Galli-Marié, as you are doubtless aware, "created" the part of Carmen when Bizet's opera was first produced in Paris. She has few, if any, equals in one or two rôles. Even Miss Marie Vanzandt is scarcely a more charming "Mignon."

The management of the Theatre Lyrique Populaire (otherwise the Château d'Eau) is making a gallant struggle against fearful obstacles, and doing its best to supply the want of cheap and good performances of opera.

Mermet's "Roland à Roncevaux" has been revived with some success, and we are shortly to have a revival of "Le Brasseur de Preston," which, by-the-bye, most of us could have done very well without.

At the Opéra the preparations for the coming production of

"Sapho" are being hurried forward. Gounod will probably conduct the first performance of the work himself. His views on the subject which divide him from Sir Michael Costa and most other chefs d'orchestre do not appear to have altered.

The Hillemacher brothers (both prix de Rome, and now studying in the "Eternal City") have, I hear, nearly completed their opera, "Henri III. et sa Cour." The libretto is founded on Alexandre Dumas' drama. C. HARRY MELTZER.

FOREIGN VIEWS OF THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

A London correspondent of the Independance Belge (the leading journal of Brussels) writes as follows on the late Leeds Festival:—

"The unanimous opinion is that the 'King David' of Sir G. A. Macfarren is the most powerful work hitherto conceived by the composer of 'The Resurrection' and 'St. John the Baptist.' The overture has 'allusions' to the pastoral life of David, and his relations with King Saul. The most remarkable number is the lamentation of David on the death of Absalom, treated with a fine feeling of dramatic effect. This English work indemnified and consoled the public for the deception that they had been made to experience by the Cantata of M. Cellier, based on Gray's "Elegy." The financial results of the Festival, moreover, attest the development of the taste for classical music at home."

The writer seems to be unaware that Mr. Cellier is a native of England, if of French extraction. Like other Gallican writers, he also blunders about dates. He compares the receipts of the late Leeds Festival, for example, with the tributes rendered last year (1882), in 1881, and 1880, whereas the meeting is only a triennial one. The actual dates of the four Festivals hitherto held were 1874, 1877, 1880, and 1883. L'Indépendance Belge is worthy of more correct correspondents, and the proprietors will be advised accordingly.

M. Gounod is said to have completed his new oratorio.

Rubinstein's "Demon" has been given in Leipzig, lately.

Gevaert's "Quentin Durward" is to be given shortly at Weimar.

Kleinmichel's opera, "Schloss de l'Orme," has been given in Hamburg.

Lecocq's "Marçotte" has enjoyed, in Barcelona, an extraordinary success.

Herr Martin Röder's oratorio, "Maria Magdalena," will be presently produced in Berlin.

Nesling's "Jung Werner der Trompeter von Säkkingen" will be heard, it is said, in Leipzig, next month.

Rubinstein's opera, "Kalaschinoff the Merchant" is shortly to be given in St. Petersburg and in Moscow.

The Russian Musical Society in St. Petersburg proposes some good symphony concerts during the season.

"Le Serment" is announced abroad as "un petit acte," by a very rich Englishman, John Urich, set to music by an amateur.

Nohl has published his work (a brochure of some 70 pages) on Wagner and his influence upon national German art.

The concerts at Leipzig are now setting in, and the performances in St. Thomas's Church have been recommenced.

The bi-centenary of Bach's birth will be celebrated next year by the erection of a colossal statue at Eisnach, his native town.

Cornelius's "Der Barber von Bagdad," Wagner's "Walkure," and Schumann's "Genoveva," are announced at Karlsruhe.

M. Paul Samuel, a Belgian, has invented an electric "Batteur de mesure," for marking the time for band and chorus in large theatres.

Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, announce among other recently published works of the composer, Raff's "Weltende, Gericht, Neue Welt."

The introduction of Wagner's music into the programmes of the Brussels Conservatoire, is described as, under M. Gevaert's direction, a veritable revolution.

It is said a mass by that interesting composer, Méhul, may be sung at the St. Cecilia Festival, at St. Eustache, n Paris. The work is dated 1804.

JOHN GOSS.

MORE striking testimony to the unanimity of the English musicians when called upon to recognise artistic merit and high social character, could hardly be pointed out than was afforded by the representative meeting at the College of Organists on Monday last. To Sir ARTHUR SULLIVAN and to Mr. T. L. SOUTHGATE must be ascribed the honour of leading the way towards an exceptional recognition of one whose talents as an artist, and admirable qualities as a man were balanced with an evenness rarely to be recorded. JOHN GOSS was born at Fareham in Hants, 27th December, 1800, and he died at Brixton, May 10, 1880. In 1811 he became one of the Children of the Chapel Royal, studying under JOHN STAFFORD SMITH, and afterwards ATTWOOD. In 1824 he was appointed organist of St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, quitting there in 1838 for St. Paul's Cathedral.

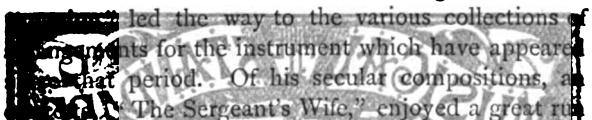
He officiated there for thirty-four years, retiring in 1872. He also occupied the post of State composer at the Chapels Royal. His public services therefore extended over a period of sixty-one years. On the occasion of writing the Te Deum, and the Anthem, "The Lord is my strength," for the Thanksgiving Service held for the recovery of the Prince of Wales in February, 1872, he received the honour of Knighthood.

In a volume of "The Harmonicon," for the year 1827, will be found a Motet from his pen, "Requiem Æternum," composed in memory of the Duke of York. His State services as composer may thus be said to have lasted forty-five years. After his retirement from active work at the cathedral, he enjoyed his well earned leisure for seven years before he died, still, however, teaching until within a short period of his death.

The value of his works must not be measured by a long list of opus numbers, but rather by their intrinsic merit. Of the thirty Anthems he composed, the best known are "If we believe," "Praise the Lord, O my "Soul," "The Wilderness," "The Lord is my "strength," "O taste and see," "Almighty and "Everlasting God." These are distinguished for their breadth, religious beauty and simple grandeur. He wrote twelve Services, besides setting separate Canticles. Of his eight Glees, "O thou whose beams," and "There is beauty on the mountain," are exquisite specimens of unaffected grace and glowing melody.

In 1833 he published "An Introduction to Harmony and Thorough Bass," a second edition in 1847, and this widely known and popular work has now reached its 15th edition. In 1841, he edited a collection of "Chants, Ancient and Modern." In 1854, in conjunction with the Rev. W. Mercer, was brought out "The Church Psalter and Hymn Book."

The series of volumes of "The Organist's Com-



led the way to the various collections of ...ments for the instrument which have appeared ... that period. Of his secular compositions, a ... "The Sergeant's Wife," enjoyed a great run ... ...ty years ago. An overture in F minor was ... at a Philharmonic concert in 1827, and another in E flat was written for performance at one of the "British Concerts" in 1835.

Sir John Goss was for many years a Professor at the R. A. M., a member of various Glee Clubs, and up to the time of his death President of Trinity College, London. At the Cathedral, the Academy, and privately by his compositions and teachings, his influence on English music has been considerable; there is hardly a church in the kingdom where some of his music is not performed weekly. After his retirement from official life, he was entertained at a public banquet at the Albion Tavern, Mr. W. H. Gladstone being the chairman.

A public subscription was subsequently opened for the purpose of endowing an Exhibition at the R. A. M. connected with his name. The personal esteem with which he was regarded, and the admiration felt for his professional talents, found illustration in the considerable sum that was collected to endow the Goss Scholarship at that Institution. This exhibition is suitably administered through the College of Organists, an institution which, like the Royal Academy of Music, the eminent Englishman duly honoured.

The general tone of the meeting of Monday last showed in a touching manner how largely the fine music and the no less distinguished amiability of the departed organist of St. Paul's had appealed to the admiration and esteem of his contemporaries and immediate professional successors. Everyone had felt the beauty of his "pure Church music" to quote Sir A. Sullivan's happy expression,—music in which the severer dignity of the older school is happily softened and tempered by the cultivated judgment and tuneful "solemn grace" of the learned yet unostentatious composer, and of the high-souled yet lowly-minded man. Many present could offer personal testimony with regard to the tender beauty of the character of the man whom they sought to honour anew. That there are many organists, choirmen and choristers, who will desire to join in the present opportunity for the permanent honouring of a great and loved name, cannot be doubted, and as Sir G. A. Macfarren, Sir A. Sullivan, and other speakers felt, it will be well to arrange the conduct of the subscription so as not to freeze out by a large moneyed generosity, however commendable that may be, the companionship of the equally generous and well meant small sums which may be offered from those who are richer in appreciation and in gratitude than they are in "this world's good."

The Treasurer of the Fund, Mr. W. H. Cummings (Brackley Villas, Dulwich), or the Secretary, Mr. T. L. Southgate (Epsleadale, Jasper Road, Gipsy Hill), will doubtless gladly acknowledge even the smallest sums which may be sent in aid of a notable scheme, whereby the memory of a good and faithful artist, a true and tender-hearted man, may be placed before the world as a shining example by the grateful recognition of many friends and of a host of admirers.

E. H. Turpin.

VAIN REPETITIONS.

Idle words, tedious reiterations, and hammerings of malleable material until it is almost attenuated into unsubstantiality, have been condemned by the highest authorities (ancient and modern). How many otherwise fair speeches are spoiled by reversions to previous sentiments! What pious church goer trembleth not, like St. James's "devils that vainly believe," when Dryasdust, too idle or too ignorant to compose his sermon, attempts to preach extempore, and in order to fill up the time, ekes out his thirty-two "sections" with one or two "points more," which—non rem ad tangit—turn out to be mere repetitions of a very trite old story. Some ordinary (not) "Conversation "Kenges" have a trick of saying an emphatic sentence twice; the writer knew a gentleman—to make a reductio ad absurdum—who invariably repeated the last word, as, for instance: "Will you "have the kindness, Sir, to pass the bottle bottle"?

And now comes forward a formidable champion of Christendom to protest against repetitions in the domain of music. A real dragon—M. Dannreuther's "Nibelungen" monster—inspired with life by some process à la Frankenstein, would shrink into its cavern, and bury its forked tail in the sand, rather than bear the brunt of Mr. Ferdinand Praeger's sharp-pointed spear. Polemics, in such a case, are out of the question. Suffice it to blow the trumpet before him as he triumphantly rides "conquering and "to conquer." Let the poor humble henchman be allowed, at the same time, to whisper, if only as a friendly hint, the warning enjoined by the haughty potentate of ancient Macedon, "Philippe, hamo es!"

Mr. PRAEGER'S opinions must always command respectful attention; he is master of his art, a musician of eminence, and a philosopher by nature. His contributions to this journal may be referred to without reserve, since the accomplished writer always signs his name in full. The question at issue was raised by Mr. PRAEGER during the 9th session of the "Musical "Association," when he read a paper on "the Fallacy "of the repetition of Parts in the classical Form."

Musicians are cognizant of the "form" condemned by Mr. PRAEGER. He holds that the first impression made by a "part" is weakened by its reproduction, and he adduces the analogy of a poet repeating half his poem, a dramatist one whole act, and a novelist one whole chapter. The opening phrase of BEETHOVEN'S Fifth Symphony, "It is Fate knocking at "the door," is cited as a case in point. "The re-"appearance of Nemesis reminds one strongly of the "return of BASILIO, with his repeated 'good night,' in 'The Barber of Seville.'" Mr. PRAEGER will not allow the precedents of the great masters, HAYDN, MOZART, and BEETHOVEN, to be made musical law. He would dare to "improve upon" them: "only "make the experiment." To the plea that repetition is required to make the ideas of the composer clearly comprehensible, Mr. PRAEGER replies with this advice: "Let those who cannot understand music "performed in public take the scores home, and "study and practise them at home." He knows some of SWINBURNE'S poems that you have to read over a dozen times to see their full beauty; and SHAKESPEARE, after 300 years, still gives rise to fresh publications every month, especially in Germany. Mr. PRAEGER explains that his contention does not apply to rhythmical compositions, such as marches and dances, because in them music only holds a subordinate position.

In the discussion that ensued, Mr. PROUT (the chairman), Mr. BANISTER, Mr. C. E. STEPHENS, Mr. G. A. OSBORNE, Dr. GLADSTONE, Dr. W. H. MONK, Mr. MOSELEY, and Mr. SHEDLOCK took part. The paper (published by the Association as a pamphlet) deserves an attentive perusal. Mr. PROUT, in an able and argumentative address, apologized for taking up a distinctly hostile line to Mr. PRAEGER; but other members thought that there was "much to be said "on both sides"; and that a very strong case had been made out by the author of the paper. Mr. CHARLES STEPHENS thought that in many cases the "repeat" was only a fashion of the day, but urged that in some cases, notably the "Scotch" Symphony, and MOZART'S Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, there were clear indications that the author really intended the parts to be repeated. Mr. PRAEGER, it will be seen, overrules this plea of authority and precedent. Dr. GLADSTONE remarked that in classical overtures there is no specimen of a repeat to be met with, but the Chairman (Mr. PROUT) quoted MENDELSSOHN'S "Military Overture," Op. 24, as an exception. Mr. PROUT also explained the difference between the overture and the sonata. In the former, with very rare exceptions, the middle portion, or "free fantasia," is either omitted altogether, or cut down to very short limits, as in MOZART'S "Figaro" for example.

It is quite an exceptional thing to have much development; you get back to the first part almost immediately, with very little development, and this may be a reason why a repetition of the first part is not necessary in an overture as in a sonata. It may be remembered that a new overture, produced at one of the Philharmonic concerts last summer, was found fault with by connoisseurs for this very reason, that the first part was formally repeated. Mr. PROUT reminded the meeting that the famous overture to "Die Zauberflöte" has no repeats; the motive of the allegro is gracefully varied, with a delicious colouring by use of the minor mode, in the second part.

The writer, with bated breath, and modest as the herald of him against whom DEMOSTHENES launched his glowing periods of Attic Greek, would simply speak as followeth. Formal repetitions, especially of plain straightforward subjects, should be avoided, as a rule. In the case of vocal pieces, many of HANDEL'S to wit, they are felt to be positively wearisome and altogether redundant. Much depends on the length of the theme, and, as shown by Mr. PROUT, on the form of the composition itself. Reminiscences, of frequent recurrence, seem to be not only allowable, but agreeable to the ear: note, as one instance that occurs en passant, the final movement of BEETHOVEN'S Sonata in G, Op. 31, No. 1. This is the "Rondo" form, and between "Rondo" and "Repetition" no comparison is admissible. Any hard and fast rule, after all, would be felt as a tyranny. Taste must ever be the supreme arbiter elegantiarum.

A. M.

Herr Rudwick, an organist of Landsberg, has composed a cantata which is well spoken of, with the title of "Armin's Kampfruf."

The post of organist of York Minster has been offered to, and accepted by, Dr. Naylor, of Scarborough, who is already recognised as a valuable Church musician. Every one will wish the doctor success in his new and responsible sphere of labour. The salary at York is at present £300, and may in time be raised to £400 per annum. The appointment was made by the whole body of the Chapter headed by the Dean, Precentor, etc., and it may therefore be presumed was settled by voting. The absurd statement made in the London papers that the salary will ultimately be £700, hardly requires contradiction. The fact is as here stated, the present salary is £300, and may in the end, on the expiration of Dr. Monk's pension, be raised to £400.

On Thursday, Oct. 18th, an organ recital was given at Christ Church, Broad Green, Croydon, by Mr. F. Cambridge, organist of the parish church. The following was the programme:—Overture, "Samson" (Handel); sanctus, "Messe Solennelle" (Gounod); fugue, "St. Ann's Tune" (J. S. Bach); andante, "Dramatic Concerto" (Spohr); Triumphal March in D (Moscheles); Selection, "Athalie" (Mendelssohn); Hallelujah, "Mount of Olives" (Beethoven). The harvest festival at this church took place on Friday, Oct. 12th, and was repeated on Sunday. The Service was choral, the choir being slightly augmented, and was very effectively rendered, the solo being sung by Master H. Townsend, of Mr. Stedman's choir, who has a splendid treble voice. Mr. J. H. W. Oclee, one of the most prominent of the local organists, played an effective selection of suitable music.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. W. S. Best had, on Saturday last, the deserved compliment of a crowded house, and he was in his best playing form. It is quite unnecessary to offer any observations upon his performance. The opening piece was his own, "Adagio and Finale Allegro con brio," which was loudly applauded. The fine Fugue in G major, by S. Wesley, was much appreciated. Listz's, "La Prédication aux Oiseaux," came next. A "Siciliana and Fugue" in G major in twelve-eight measure of a gigue type, by J. S. Bach, were very finely rendered and encored. Mr. Best then played "The Trumpet Fugue." Morandi's attractive "Rondo de Campanelli" was the final solo. Miss Carlotta Elliot gave great pleasure by her very artistic singing, and was encored in one song, of which she repeated the last verses. Mr. F. Meen accompanied. To-night Dr. Peace, of Glasgow, will be the soloist.

The organ has been built by J. W. Walker and Sons. It has two Manuals and Pedal, with eighteen stops. The instrument is, for its size, very effective.

MANCHESTER.

Two recitals were given on the new organ now building for St. James's Church, Daisy Hill, Westhoughton, at the Central Organ Works, Mulberry Street, Hulme, by the following gentlemen :—Wednesday, October 4th, Mr. J. Kendrick, Manchester Town Hall ; Thursday, October 25th, Mr. Wm. Mullineux, organist, Bolton Town Hall. The instrument was built by Messrs. W. E. Richardson and Sons, London, Manchester, and Preston. The organ has three Manuals and Pedal, and some thirty-four stops.

The organ is constructed on W. Richardson and Sons' principle, having two bellows with regulating valve for regularity of pressure, the action of which works on pivots. The case is of pitch pine, being very choice, with spotted metal front pipes and of a beautiful design. The whole of the action is bushed with cloth, and the squares, backfalls, &c., made of mahogany.

WATFORD.

The following is the specification of the new organ in St. Andrew's Church, built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, and opened by Mr. James Turpin, Mus. Bac., Cantab., at the Harvest Thanksgiving on Friday evening, October 12th :—

SCALE COLOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I have only time this week to say that I concur with Dr. W. J. Foxell, of Amersham, with respect to his opinion (expressed in the Mus. Stand. of Oct. 3rd), that any representation of the notes in our musical scale by colour is unscientific and absurd. The analogy between colour and pitch may be poetical and pretty, but is it exact? The "equal temperament" of the scale is still a vexed question, and I wish that Mr. A. Ellis, Dr. Stone, Mr. C. E. Stephens, or Dr. E. Hopkins, or some other learned pundit, would thoroughly sift it. I have always leaned to the opinion that there is no different character of keys, that to term D major a "bright," and E flat or D flat a "soft" key, is nonsense. Helmholtz's authority should be sufficient; but doctors, as ever, disagree. The temperament on the pianoforte and the organ is not exactly "equal," owing to certain compromises, a mystery of the tuning art. And again, I have been informed by players in the orchestra of the opera that a different "colour" or character of key, is produced by using the open, or stopped strings of the violins and violoncellos. Without "stopped" strings and accommodations of temperament, the difference between D and E flat, or between B major and D flat, would be simply a difference of pitch. In a word, the vibrations may be more rapid, hence the rising of the pitch ; they may be more ample, and hence louder or more sonorous ; and lastly the mutable form of the vibrations, or different directions of the sound waves, produces the well known varieties of tone, cæteris paribus, the pitch and the intervals remaining the same. But I wish rather to inquire than to dogmatise.

Yours faithfully,
ALFONSO MATTHEY.

COLOUR-MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I cannot expect to be allowed to intrude as far upon your space as to put down even a tithe of the thoughts suggested by your notice of my letter to the Standard, and your review of Mr. Hughes' work. But perhaps you will be able to find room for a very few words just to explain my position.

It is my firm conviction, based on experience, that the system of musical intervals may be used with good effect by artists, to secure the harmony of their colours, and having established, provisionally, a basis of correspondence between colours and musical notes. I have long been engaged in testing its truth by actual experiment, that is, by colouring pictures so as to display given chords, and observing, with the help of others, how far they exhibit the same character as their musical counterparts. Whatever doubt may, as yet, be attached to my experiments with such chords as that of the dominant ninth, there can be none as to the correspondence of my colours with musical notes in respect of this quality, as major or minor. It was therefore a disappointment to me to find that Mr. Hughes follows so many previous writers in the error of reckoning the ascending scale down the solar spectrum, from red, through orange, to yellow, etc., instead of in the contrary direction, as I do. For the effect of this error is to invert the music, and substitute minor chords for major. Thus he makes red, yellow, and blue a major chord, whereas if he put it on a picture and compared it with blue, buff, and red (my D, F sharp, and A), he would find that it is palpably minor, and corresponds, as I give it, to D F A. His system, if inverted, will be almost the same as mine. This error, however, is founded on the notion that we ought to compare the number of undulations for second in light with the vibrations of sound. And in fact, it is not the number of undulations but the length of the waves (which are in inverse ratio to the number of undulations) by which we should reckon, since the longer the wave the greater is the impression which it makes on the retina of the eye, and the "sharper," in musical language, is its effect.

You object, not unnaturally, to my speaking of a common chord as "a mere make-weight." Of course I was not then speaking of musical notes, but of the notes in colour, and I am free to confess that this description is somewhat rough, and requires limitation, for which I had not space at my command. Nevertheless, there is a great difference in this matter between music and colour. In the former you may find four notes to a chord a very bare minimum, whilst in a picture it is sometimes impossible to use more than two with good effect. I say this, not so much from the observation of my own poor attempts at painting, as from the consideration of pictures by great masters, who generally syncopate their chords. I am not so foolish as to suppose that it is possible, by means of any theory, to teach artists a new system of colouring quite unknown to them at present. As music existed long before the rules of harmony were discovered, so it must be with colouring, and any the[illegible] essence of the chord still remains, then you will have little difficulty in finding many of the chords in my system already in constant use by artists. In pictures where the artist limits himself to three colours in one chord, of which an exhibition at the Royal Academy generally supplies a considerable number, you will find the fifth, but in many of the more ambitious flights, such as those of Sir F. Leighton, you will find more than one chord, yet seldom a fifth, as far as I have hitherto observed, with any of them. Perhaps I should have better expressed my meaning by saying that in colour the fifth is always implied by the rest and the third; but as I am afraid I have already trespassed too much on your kind indulgence, I will only add that in some points there must needs be a difference between musical chords and chords of colour, whilst it may be quite possible to show, as I hope to do, when not pressed for elbow-room, that such differences involve no discrepancy of fundamental principles.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. P. BETHELL.

Passing Events.

Signor Vianesi conducts the new opera in New York.

Herr Franke will again be associated with the management of the Richter concerts.

The Howlers Club gave a smoking concert on Oct. 18th. Mr. W. W. Robinson was the pianist.

Mr. Cowen's "St. Ursula" is to be given by the New York Oratorio Society on Nov. 21st and 22nd.

Le Ménestrel is enthusiastic in its praise of Leeds Festival, both as regards composers and executants.

Mr. Mackenzie is fortunate enough to have Mr. Joseph Bennett as his librettist for his oratorio for Birmingham.

Mr. F. Amor has recovered his health and is again to enter his profession as a violinist. A subscription has been started as an expression of sympathy.

The total number of listeners at the Leeds Festival came to 13,984 for the seven performances. Upon several occasions the audience numbered 2000.

Sir Julius Benedict is said to be composing incidental music for the new poetical drama by Messrs. Wills and Herman, now in preparation at the Princess's Theatre.

The "Birds" of Aristophanes will be represented at Cambridge this term. The performance will take place on the evenings of November 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th, and on the afternoon of December 1st; and great care is being taken to secure a thoroughly efficient cast. Mr. Hubert Parry supplies the music.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed at their entertainment, St. George's Hall, have produced an entirely new musical sketch, by Mr. Corney Grain, entitled "On the Thames;" and a new after piece, by Mr. Arnold Felix, music by Mr. George Gear, entitled "A Water Cure." The highly successful "Treasure Trove" still retains its place in the programme.

Brainard's Musical World has an interesting account of the various portraits of Beethoven, in the course of which it says:—Only three oil paintings were taken from life. The first of these represents the master when thirty years of age. It is considered an inferior work, and but few engravings have been made from it. The second was executed by Schimon when Beethoven was forty-nine years of age. The third was still later in life and is the work of Stieler, of Munich.

The passion for theatrical realism is naturally bringing its accompanying dangers. A terrible accident is reported to have occurred in the Grand Theatre, Moscow, on the occasion of the last representation of M. Rubinstein's opera of "The Demon." A platform suspended by cords, and supporting seven little girls—pupils of the Dramatic School—figuring as genii, suddenly gave way through the snapping of the cords. The children, who fell from a height of about 17 feet on to the stage, were found to have suffered more or less from concussion of the brain. Two of the victims were also seriously wounded. Surely the authorities ought to be well taken to task for allowing children to be so placed.

Says the Athenæum, it is possible that two of the most esteemed of living continental composers will visit London next season, thanks to the initiative of the Philharmonic Society. Eduard Grieg has accepted an invitation to play a new pianoforte concerto, and overtures have also been made to Anton Dvorák to compose and conduct an orchestral work.

The Annual Festival of the Guild of St. Luke, was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday evening, the 18th inst. The musical portion of the service was carried out by the London Gregorian Choral Association, with about 150 voices, under the direction of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, who very ably presided at the organ. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Bedford.

On Tuesday, October 16th, on the occasion of the fourth annual general meeting of the Ware Musical Society, the members presented their honorary conductor, Mr. James L. Gregory & Co. with a valuable gold watch and chain, as a token of their esteem and appreciation of his musical talent. The works selected for practice and performance by the society during the present season are Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," Macfarren's "May-day," and Haydn's "Spring."

Mr. Willing's Choir at St. James's Hall, announce a very spirited prospectus. The subscription will comprise a series of four concerts, as follows:—Tuesday, 11th Dec., 1883, Sir George Macfarren's "King David." Tuesday, 15th Jan., 1884, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," 57th Psalm, by E. H. Thorne, and Selection. Tuesday, 25th March, 1884, Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Tuesday, 22nd April, 1884, Wilfred Bendall's cantata, "Parizadeh," and an operatic selection. The orchestra is of the best possible quality.

Some time ago Mr. N. Holmes, offered to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, his grand four-manual organ, which is now in the concert-room at Haverstock Hill. The organ was built at a cost of £8,600, but it has been offered to the Dean and Chapter for a sum considerably less than the original cost. The principal objection the Chapter had to the instrument being placed in the cathedral was that it would mar the architecture of the building, and would obstruct the fine view of the nave which is now obtained from both aisles. This objection Mr. Holmes thinks may be obviated, and a mock representation of the appearance of the organ and the space it would occupy, is now being placed in the cathedral.

Says a contemporary, "Sing a Song of Sixpence" is as old as the sixteenth century. "Three Blind Mice," is found in a music-book dated 1609. "The Frog and the Mouse" in 1580. "Three Children Sliding on the Ice" dates from 1639. "London Bridge is broken down" is of unfathomed antiquity. "Girls and Boys, Come out to Play" is certainly as old as the reign of Charles II., as is also "Lucy Locket lost her Pocket," to the tune of which the American song of "Yankee Doodle" was written. "Pussy Cat, Pussy Cat, Where have you been?" is of the age of Queen Bess. "Little Jack Horner" is older than the Seventeenth Century. "The Old Woman tossed in a Blanket" is of the reign of James II., to which monarch it is supposed to allude.

Says the Huddersfield Daily Chronicle, In the list of candidates for the degree of musical doctor who have satisfied the Oxford University examiners, was the name of R. M. Winn, New College, and Harborne, Birmingham. Rowland Mellor Winn is a nephew of our veteran organist, Mr. Richard Mellor, and also a nephew of Mr. William Winn, of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. James's, and St. Paul's Cathedral, London. He obtained the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford before he was 20 years of age. He has composed an oratorio, "The Sea of Galilee," for his university test of Doctor of Music, this term. This oratorio, with full orchestral accompaniments, is to be performed at Oxford. Dr. Winn will take his singers and orchestra from Birmingham. The doctor is another proof of what natural talent, coupled with good training, will do. From a child he was taught the piano by his mother—who will be well-known to some of our readers as Miss Mellor—a clever pianoforte player and organist in Huddersfield above 30 years ago. This lady is still in the full possession of all her powers, as was shown by her playing, as duets, with her brother (Mr. Richard Mellor) some of Handel's choruses on the organ at our Exhibition a few weeks ago.

Musical Degree.—At what University in Great Britain, or Ireland, can a Musical Degree be taken without passing an Arts Examination, and what are the best books for study for that University?—Organist.

Expense of Instruction, etc. — What would a lady's yearly expense be for a course of instruction and living in London, at the R.A.M., or R.C.M. in piano and organ; or at Berlin, under Kullauk and Lange, amount to?—Provincial.

Reply.

J. I. F.—"Thou Judge of quick and dead" forms the concluding movement of S. S. Wesley's eight-part anthem, "Let us lift up our heart," but is not published separately. The complete anthem is to be had of Novello and Co., in folio size, price 4s. As to "Behold, how good and pleasant," I am unable to say whether it is by Henry or Sir George Smart. There is no mention made of it in the life of the former composer by Dr. Spark, neither can I find it in any music catalogue. I should think it was most probably by Sir George Smart, who composed some Cathedral music, and of which I once saw a list, but am unable to recollect whether the anthem in question was in it. Addison and Co., were, I think, the publishers.—J. S. Bumpus.

Conductor.—The Leamington Philharmonic Society has set of copies of "The Ancient Mariner," including orchestral parts. Will "Conductor" communicate with A. E. Gibbs, Hon. Sec., who will make any reasonable arrangement.

HELE & COMPANY,

ORGAN BUILDERS,

WYNDHAM STREET, PLYMOUTH.

London Agency: Mr. W. H. HELE, 69, Gresham St., E.C.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

THE VOICE

MUSICALLY AND MEDICALLY CONSIDERED.

BY

ARMAND SEMPLE, B.A., M.B., Cantab., M.R.C.P., Lond.,

Physician to the Royal Society of Musicians.

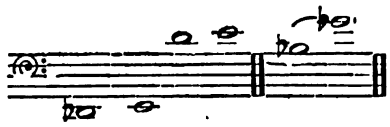
CLASSIFICATION OF CULTIVATED VOICES.

MALE VOICES.

As has been already stated, these voices may be classified as Bass (the lowest in the male vocal scale); Baritone (one-third above the bass); Tenor (one-third above the baritone); Contraltino or Counter-tenor, one-third above the tenor, and highest in the male vocal scale.

The BASS VOICE should be confined to the Chest register, which may in the most fortunate case be extended from Re flat$_1$ (D flat$_1$) to Mi$_3$ (E$_3$)



It experiences considerable difficulty in reaching the falsetto notes, which extend from Si flat$_2$ (B flat$_2$) to Sol flat$_3$ (G flat$_3$).

The BARITONE VOICE may be extended from Sol$_1$ (G$_1$) to Sol$_2$ (G$_2$) in the chest voice. The Falsetto extends from Si$_2$ (B$_2$) to Si$_3$ (B$_3$) thus Baritone, Tenor, and Counter-Tenor Voices can produce falsetto notes with almost the same ease as Female Voices.

The TENOR VOICE may extend from Do$_2$ (C$_2$) to La$_3$ (A$_3$) in the chest.

The Falsetto extends from Re$_3$ (D$_3$) to Do sharp$_4$ (C sharp$_4$)

The Head voice extends from Re$_4$ (D$_4$) to Mi$_4$ (E$_4$) and Fa$_4$ (F$_4$).

Tenors can combine the chest and falsetto registers with more ease than Baritones, since the pitch of modern music being too high for Tenor singers, they are compelled to fall back upon the Falsetto; but the employment of this register ought in every case to depend upon the aptitude of the voice in blending the timbre of the chest and the falsetto registers.

The CONTRALTINO or COUNTER TENOR is the highest voice in the male scale. Its quality is light and clear; the Chest voice may extend from Re$_2$ (D$_2$) to Do$_4$ (C$_4$); the Falsetto from Re$_3$ (D$_3$) to Do sharp $_4$ (C sharp $_4$) and the Head from Re$_4$ (D$_4$) to Fa sharp $_4$ (F sharp $_4$) thus Chest Voice. Falsetto. Head Voice.

This voice can combine the chest and falsetto registers with more ease than other male voices. It is the thinnest and most effeminate of the male voices.

FEMALE VOICES.

In women there are four kinds of voices.

The Contralto, the lowest in the female vocal scale.

The Mezzo Soprano, one-third above the Contralto.

The Soprano, one-third above the Mezzo Soprano.

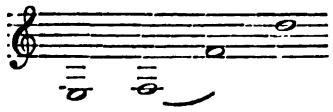
The Soprano-Sopracuto (rare) one-third above the soprano and the highest in the female scale.

The Chest (Voce di Petto) Register.

This register more exclusively belongs to the Contralto voice. It is of less importance in the Mezzo-Soprano, and Soprano. It is, however, the basis of the female voice. Including the deepest voice, the compass of this register is from Mi$_2$ (E$_2$) to Re$_4$ (D$_4$).



The highest note of this register should never go beyond Mi$_3$ (E$_3$) or Fa$_3$ (F$_3$) since any straining above these sounds might entirely destroy the voice.

The Falsetto (Voce di Fasetto) Register.

This is the most remarkable part of the Mezzo-Soprano voice. It descends nearly as low, and ascends quite as high as the chest register. The notes, however, between Sol$_2$ (G$_2$) and Re$_3$ (D$_3$) are usually weak, and wanting in energy. Although the registers of the chest and falsetto possess the same compass, the character of the former is vigorous, sonorous, and penetrating, whilst, on the contrary, that of the latter is soft and veiled.

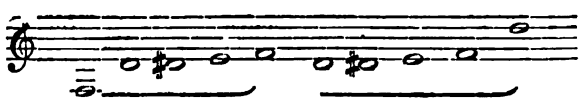
The notes from Sol$_3$ (G$_3$) to Re$_4$ (D$_4$).

when produced in the chest register, call for so much effort, that their employment in this manner for a few years might probably destroy the voice permanently. These notes are, however, sung with perfect ease in the falsetto register; to obviate weakness in the low notes of the scale the compass should be formed by uniting the two registers. The chest being employed from Fa$_3$ (F$_3$) to Fa$_3$ (F$_3$), the Falsetto from Re$_3$ (D$_3$) to Re$_4$ (D$_4$), thus—

Chest. Falsetto.



four sounds being thus reserved which are common to the two registers. The capability of changing the registers on any of their notes is thus retained.

The Head (Voce di Testa) Register.

The brilliancy of Soprano Voices is chiefly due to the ease with which they can produce the high sounds. These voices in the lower sounds are comparatively weak.

The following tables show the Registers of the Female Voices:—

The Contralto.

Chest. Falsetto. Head.

The Mezzo-Soprano.

In these tables, in each register three or four notes are allowed as the limit since every individual possesses varying capabilities of extension.

(To be continued.)

REMINISCENCES OF AN OLD REPORTER.

I must begin by reverting to the Philharmonic Society, and a certain incident which I assumed to be founded on fact, a few weeks ago. A learned authority, a veritable "book in breeches," as Sydney Smith used to call Babington Macaulay, doubts, if he does not directly deny, that Mendelssohn asked the directors of the Society to dismiss an artist who had presumed to call him to account for "keeping the band waiting" at rehearsal. I can only repeat that Henry Westrop, the "second violin," gave me the information, and Westrop was not a man to circulate idle gossip. Perhaps Mr. Charles E. Stephens, who knows everything about the Philharmonic, may be able to decide this dispute de facto.

A highly respectable Society, called the "British Musicians," flourished for awhile about the years 1840—46. The object, as one of the Westrops said, was to give professionals an opportunity of "playing their own things"; and several excellent works for the chamber were produced from time to time. The Society included amongst its principal members G. A. Macfarren, Cipriani Potter, H. Westrop, T. Westrop, James Davison, Lucas, and other notables. I have before spoken of one Alsager, on the staff of the Times, as City Correspondent and musical reporter; but he subsequently gave up the latter duty in favour of his nephew, John Oxenford, who knew as much of music (until he took lessons in the theory of the art) as Mr. Snodgrass did of skates! What induced Alsager to make an attack upon the Society of British Musicians, deponent cannot testify; but the deed was done. One foggy morning in December, 1844, there appeared, in the Times, a column of minion type, "lead-lined," in which the leading members of the Society were sharply assailed in turn, especially Lucas and Cipriani Potter. Those of your readers who wish to read this article may go to Peele's Coffee House or the British Museum. I forget the details. The gist of the article was that the composers referred to had done nothing to advance the art, and that the Society itself was practically worthless for that purpose. James Davison and Mr. Macfarren were let off with a bit of cautionary advice to mind their p's and q's. Alsager, although he deceived none of the initiated by the crafty device, was so mean as to add a postcript to his article, which informed the public that it had not been written by the regular musical reporter, but by a gentleman of authority, to be relied on as evidence! Oxenford at this time wrote the critiques for the Times, doing double duty at the opera and the theatres, both lyrical and dramatic: the drama was his forte. James Davison succeeded him in 1846, and began his work with a masterly analysis of "Elijah," which appeared in long primer type a week before the performance at Birmingham, also reviewed in detail by Mr. J. Davison. Reverting to the "British Musicians," I heard that Cipriani Potter had offended Alsager by declining, on religious grounds, to play at his Sunday receptions in Queen Square, Bloomsbury. If this be true, the worse for poor Alsager's reputation. I remember Cipriani Potter well; I had not known him personally up to the year 1868-9, but I then encountered the venerable musician at Mr. Hallé's recitals, and also at the Crystal Palace Concerts. At the Recitals he once kindly lent me his Programme Book (presented to him as a mark of respect by one of Mr. Chappell's employés), with the observation that he discerned my deep interest in the performance. I had, as usual, been taking copious notes. Potter told me a personal anecdote. He had received a stall for the Italian Opera, at Drury Lane Theatre, and presented himself, at eight o'clock, without the compulsory "swallow-tail" coat. The officials refused to admit him in his surtout, and Potter retired in discomfiture. But Balm in Gilead! On reading the large post-bills outside the theatre, Potter saw that the opera of the night was "Rigoletto." This work of Verdi's did not satisfy the old musician's severe tastes, and he thus rejoiced in the gain of a loss. Potter did not explain to me why he neglected to read the advertisement of the theatre in the morning papers, or why, a veteran "about town," he failed to don the regular evening dress always insisted on at the Opera. Aliquando Homerus dormitat! When Cipriani Potter honoured Mr. Hallé with his attendance, that great pianist was running through the eleven sonatas of Schubert in rotation; he repeated them regularly for a few years, in 1867-69. I wish that he would revert to them once more, for they are rarely to be heard. All have their merits, but commend me to Nos. 10 and 11 in A major, and B flat. Like the little girl's affection for her papa and mamma, "I like both best." The "Fantasia Sonata" in G, the three in A minor, and the so-called "Military Sonata" in B major, are also pearls of price. Sir George Grove and Mr. Manns should make some of their pianists play these sonatas at the Crystal Palace on Saturdays, instead of the often hackneyed "fugitive" solos.

Ecce iterum Crispinus! Alsager once more, for he had much to do with music, and deserves his meed of praise. He founded the "Beethoven Quartet Society," and so paved the way for the proper performance of the five "Posthumous" quartets, now annually reproduced by Mr. Arthur Chappell on a festival Wednesday afternoon in March. These and other classical chamber compositions were rendered at Alsager's house by the finest artists in London. Scipion Rousselot, the violoncellist, dedicated his splendid edition of the "Posthumous" quartets to "his friend Alsager" as a grateful recognition of the good work by him achieved. Alsager played the violoncello fairly well, but said that he could no longer bear to hear himself, after Rousselot, Lindley, and other grand artists. Alsager sometimes devoted the Sunday to Mass Services. On one occasion, full forty years ago (or more), Spohr was entertained, in Queen Square, together with a host of musical notables, on a fine Sunday in the height of summer. A grand concert, which lasted some hours, was agreeably relieved with a superb banquet; both the programme and the menu were printed in gold letters. The selection of music I forget, but you may rely on my word that no grinding ballads or "royalty" songs found a place in the scheme; most of the numbers would, of course, be instrumental and concerted. Alsager, although he cared little for theology or dogma, usually invited a clergyman, his friend, whom he addressed, at table, as "Mr. Chaplain," and asked him to say grace. I met this worthy pastor in 1840 and 1841, at Alsager's house, and believe that he is still alive, as the Rev. Charles Perring, once assistant minister of Regent Square Chapel, St. Pancras, but now "unattached." Spohr, on this golden Sunday, of course received all honour, and his health was drunk in bumpers of champagne con amore. After the death of Mrs. Alsager, the widower gave up his receptions, lost his spirits, and finally, as I have before related, destroyed himself, on his dismissal from the post of City Correspondent to the Times, in November, 1846. Two years before, when a grand dinner took place at the London Tavern in honour of the Times newspaper, whose Paris correspondent had exposed an infamous conspiracy, to the detriment of the mercantile and commercial interests. Alsager, on returning thanks for the toast to himself, boasted that he had written the City Article for twenty-seven years. How slippery are the paths of life! What dreadful cadences in this world, from high estate, that do not end in the major mode!

Cipriani Potter's adventure at Drury Lane Theatre reminds me of Auber. That great French composer was one night "kept out in the cold" at the Opéra Comique, not for incorrect costume, but because he had arrived late; and it was the rule to refuse admission to all tardy ones—most properly—until the particular piece was over. Mr. Walter Bache and Mr. Dannreuther, of the Wagner Society, have followed the good example. The Directors of the Crystal Palace might follow suit. They ought to, and indeed do, insist on the exclusion of visitors during the actual performance of a number at the Saturday concerts. The first overture, or symphony, used to be accompanied by an obbligato stampede of elephantine tramps, and the incessant talking would irritate even the passive turtle-dove which, naturalists say, will allow its eyes to be plucked out, yet offer no resistance!

I must defer my references to the "Musical Union" until I can have an interview with Professor Ella, now, alas! afflicted with blindness, but otherwise hale and hearty.

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

Sir George Macfarren's symphony was written for the British Orchestral Society, and produced at their concert on the 26th of March, 1874. Many works are brilliant and clever, but few are really artistic. No one can suppose that Sir G. Macfarren is deficient in this respect. The controversy which still goes on between the old school and the new, and in which Sir G. Macfarren is a leading champion of the former, naturally provokes many of the new lights to criticize in the severest manner every work of his. Too harsh a line is perhaps drawn between these two apparently opposite schools by the accomplished professor. It is maintained by his opponents—and with some show of reason—that rules are liable to continual change, that genius to a certain extent makes its own rules, and that an instrumental work should not only rest upon a poetic basis, but its form also should be dictated by the nature and order of the poetical material. He who does this is supposed to take a more exalted view of art than one who plays a perpetual sort of game of skill in accordance with certain fixed rules. Last week I spoke of Raff as being a mixture of the two, and had he possessed the genius of Mozart or Beethoven, two contending schools might have been happily blended and so have put an end to the strife. In the symphony above alluded to, we have an example—perhaps not one of the best—of a stern uncompromising adherence to old forms and ancient regulations, the only exception being the substitution of the gavotte for the minuet. It was an appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotions, and the general impression made by it must, I fear, have been disappointing to the talented composer, who was present on the occasion.

English musicians were abundantly represented. Amongst other things I must not forget to mention one of the most perfect gems, Bennett's overture, "Paradise and the Peri." This alone was worth going to hear.

Sir R. Stewart's work was an agreeable surprise. It is bright, brilliant, clever, and artistic.

Of Mr. E. Howell's performance on the 'cello, I cannot speak too highly. His success and the appreciation he met with were most emphatic.

Miss Hilda Coward is fast coming to the front. Her voice is heard to advantage even in this large concert-room, and her enunciation—a thing too often neglected—is most perfect. Mdme. Patey of course came in for her full share of admiration. R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

I am rather amused at the chaffing of some of your daily contemporaries with respect to the "titular" prefixes of the composers. All of them certainly have handles to their names, although to be called "Sir" can hardly be reckoned an exalted honour, not at least when the word merely signifies a knight bachelor. What's in a name, however, if the music be good? Sir Herbert Oakeley's march in E flat, a mere piece d'occasion, has a bold, broad, and striking subject, rather alloyed by reiteration; the passage for flute and hautboy with moving bass pizzicato, struck me as excellent. The numbers to which are appended the honoured names of Sterndale Bennett and Arthur Sullivan, have always been heard with admiration. Sir A. P. Stewart's "Orchestral Prelude" in D is not a strong specimen of "programme music," although tuneful, nicely scored, and marked by striking contrasts. Mr. E. Howell achieved a signal success and to him is due the patient hearing of Goltermann's dreadfully dull concerto, whereof the commonplace finale reminds one of "Draw the swords of Scotland"! Boccherini proved to be a still greater bore.

Sir G. A. Macfarren listened to his own symphony from the gallery, with the orchestra in full front. I heard the work when first produced at a concert of the British Orchestral Society in March, 1874. The first elaborate allegro stamps the symphony as a chef-d'œuvre. The "Serenade," in C, has a reminder, doubtless accidental, of the Count of Luna's air in "Il Trovatore," "Il balen del suo sorriso," the hautboy comes in very prettily in the "Musette" of the 3rd movement, with an effective bassoon part below. The use of bright major keys (E and B) in the finale, tends to relieve the grave, if not sombre, character of the first movement. Miss Hilda Coward has a clear, rather shrill soprano, but must study her shakes, and other details. Mdme. Patey's revival of Sir Jules Benedict's "Sad Sea Waves" song, was most acceptable. "The First Walpurgus Night" is down for this afternoon, and Mr. Carrodus will play a "Fandango" by Molique, I hope something lively, for Molique is usually dry as a stick. A. M.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

The autumn season, of three concerts, began last Monday, with the following programme:—

Huldigungs-Marsch	Wagner.
Overture, "Die Akademische"	Brahms.
Introduction to Act III., "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner.
Der Ritt der Walkuren, "Die Walküre"	,,

Symphony, No. 6, in F ("The Pastoral") Beethoven. So thoroughly familiar a scheme calls for but little comment, the performance being above criticism. The band was in splendid form, the brass showing to extraordinary advantage in the opening number. Herr Richter was received with the customary enthusiasm: his presence among us is productive of good results, and his audience, well knowing this, does not fail to acknowledge its indebtedness. In spite of the Wagner mania that has occasionally possessed us, in spite of the conscientious efforts of some able musicians in our midst to familiarize us with his music, we should even now know but little of the inexpressible beauty of Wagner's works, heard as music pure and simple, were it not for the periodical visits of Hans Richter. Our English artists are undoubtedly aware of this, or they would not have assembled so numerously to listen with unwavering attention to music that they could probably hum through from beginning to end. There is always something new to be learnt by those who hear aright; for music is inexhaustible, boundless, divine, as Nature herself. Who can say that he has discovered the last beauty that is revealable in a perfect performance of—for example—the Huldigungs-March?—not only the finest "occasional piece" that was ever written, but one of the most perfect and attractive specimens of polyphonic composition in existence.

Some critics have thought fit to blame Herr Richter for bringing with him "nothing new"; others complained a few seasons ago because he came laden with novelties. Fortunately for us Herr Richter follows his own counsel: he tells us of Wagner (and perhaps also of Beethoven) what we do not hear elsewhere. Of "novelties" from Wagner's writings, he could give us only the Cantata of "The Last Supper" (an early work that we would gladly hear), or some numbers from "Parsifal,"—and perhaps—who can prophecy?—that last unapproached, sacred work had better be left for performance amid the solemnizing influences of Bayreuth! Mr. Barnby will soon give us an opportunity of judging how far we may be capable of supplying for ourselves the want of scenic illusions, how far we can forget what the tyrant, custom, has taught us, and (as Jarno said to Wilhelm Meister) "not cavil at the form"—the rest being left to our "own good sense and feeling"; how far we shall "prepare ourselves by reading and meditation for the great religious drama which we are to witness,"* as was the practice of the more serious of the Beyreuth audience. Herr Richter, at all events, arranged a programme which satisfied his audience: for the "Meistersinger" number was redemanded and repeated, while there was an unopposed call for a repetition of the "Walkürenritt," which was hushed only when Herr Richter had by frequent bows and reappearances testified his unwillingness to go through any more of his numbers a second time.

It is a pity that the doors are not closed during the performance of each piece: the practice not only gives comfort to those who arrive in proper time, but engenders a feeling of reverence for art, respect for artists, and consideration for our fellow-auditors, beneficial to the art-world at large.

A few words on the Pastoral Symphony and "programme" music may be offered for consideration next week.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first "Students' Chamber Concert" was held last Friday afternoon (Oct. 26), at St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Wm. Shakespeare. Purcell's Anthem, "O sing unto the Lord a new song," opened the business at half-past two o'clock, and went well. Another sacred number was Brahms's Psalm XIII., "O Lord, how long, &c.," for choir of ladies. Here might be noticed a good balance of tone and effective crescendos at the proper place.

Some original compositions of the students were produced. Mr. E. Kiver's tenor song, "If ye love me," denotes good style: smoothness and fluency, but no novelty. Mr. Hulbert Fulkerson was the exponent. Mr. Kilvington Hattersley's setting of Longfellow's Serenade (from "The Spanish Student"), although mild, soft, and pretty, has not sufficient variety for so many stanzas; this theme, a poor one in itself, has been quite overdone by our song-writers. Mr. G. J. Bennett's first song, "The road to Slumberland," suffers from the very childish words, only fit, indeed, for "babies" on their way to "*Bed*fordshire." The second effusion, "As spirits watch from above," has a certain colouring of the German lied, and won an encore d'estime, as no actual encores are allowed. These pieces were fairly interpreted by Miss L. Pople and Miss Kate W. Payne.

The pianists played very well. Miss Annie Mukle (Lady Goldsmid scholar), chose Mendelssohn's "Seventeen Variations" in D minor; she has neat, distinct, enunciation, but is a little too automatic. Miss Alice Dyer read Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28, with much delicacy and finesse, displaying good technical execution in the florid passages. Mr. C. S. Macpherson played part of Sir G. A. Macfarren's third Sonata in G minor, clever but rather dry, music, with a happy humouring of the text, an incisive touch, and firm grasp of the key-board. Miss Dora Bright's (own) "Two Sketches" in F sharp minor, and A, are elegant little esquisses; a loud and most improper recall failed to induce a reappearance of the young lady. Mr. H. C. Tonking was applauded for his execution of H. Smart's "Con moto moderato" in D minor, and Mr. Richardson, for his performance of two pieces for the violin, composed by Mr. German E. Jones (student). Other numbers, by well-known composers, completed a too long scheme.

ST. PAUL'S, BOW COMMON.

The Dedication Festival of this church took place on Tuesday last, Oct. 30th, the services commencing at the early hour of 7 a.m. with a choral celebration, at which the choir sang for the first time, Mozart's 4th Mass in C, arranged for the English service by Mr. Horace Buttery, organist and choirmaster of the church. At the evening service the choir was augmented to about 140 voices by the aid of the choirs of St. Mary's, Boltons, S.W., St. Peter's, South Kensington, and St. Mary's Haggerston, and others. The Rev. J. B. Powell's Processional "Salve Festa dies," opened the service with fine effect. The canticles were sung to Stainer in B flat, and the anthem was Mendelssohn's noble eight-part Psalm, "Sing to the Lord a new made song," which was sung as written, that is, the first two movements unaccompanied, the organ coming in at the third movement with splendid effect, the large choir not having in the least sunk in pitch; and the whole service (concluding with Handel's "Hallelujah"), was rendered with the greatest vigour and precision. Mr. Buttery conducted the anthem and accompanied at the organ other parts of the service, being assisted by Mr. Mortimer J. Dudman; and Mr. Chas. W. Pearce, Mus.Bac., played at the conclusion of the service one of Mendelssohn's organ sonatas and a march by E. Silas. The dedication services were to be continued on Wednesday by a performance by the St. Paul's, Bow Common, choir alone, of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's "Song of Victory" at 8 p.m., and the list of music for the continuation of the festival on Sunday next will be seen in another column.

On Oct. 22nd, the same combination of choirs as above assisted at the Dedication Festival Evensong at St. Mary's, Boltons, the arrangements of the service and music selected being almost identical, and under the same musical direction, Mr. Buttery being organist and director of the choir at both churches. At St. Mary's, at the conclusion of the service, Mr. J. M. Crament, Mus.Bac., organist of Holy Trinity, Brompton, gave a short recital on Messrs. Hill's new organ.

MUSIC AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are themselves good musicians, and at their "Entertainments," always popular and amusing, good care is taken to provide a variety of sweet sounds. At the Hall, in Langham Place, may now be witnessed, twice a day, the "Treasure Trove," written by Mr. A. Law, with music by A. J. Caldicott. Also, a "New Second Part," entitled, "The Water Cure," words by Arnold Felix, and music by Mr. George Gear. The slight plot of this funny piece runs on some absurd mistakes made in a hydropathic establishment. Mr. George Gear, well known as an elegant composer of sonatas for the pianoforte, and many very superior vocal pieces, has written some sprightly music for the little extravaganza. The overture in G, gives good promise; the duet in D, "Her anger I'll brave," deserves the applause always liberally bestowed; and the trio in G, "Think what misery and shame," with an episode in the tonic minor, rises to a climax. An ensemble in G, and a final laughing quartet, complete the score, except a "Lullaby," which is, for the present, omitted. W. G. Goss accompanies his songs on a grand Erard, with the aid of a harmonium. The characters of "A Water Cure" are sustained by Miss F. Holland, Miss M. Wardroper, Mr. North Hope, and Mr. Alfred Reed. Mr. Corney Grain appears in the "Treasure Trove," which is opened by a pretty instrumental prelude.

VICTORIA COFFEE HALL.

For several months past a movement has been on foot at the above hall, for the purpose of organising a permanent choir, that the frequenters of the "Old Vic." might smoke their pipes, sip their coffee, or partake of a "revolutionary cup of tea" and enjoy good music at the same time. The idea is a commendable one, which deserves encouragement. The conductor of the choir in question is Mr. W. Sexton (lay vicar of Westminster Abbey) who took his Benefit Concert here on Thursday, Oct. 25th; it was announced as "a grand operatic night," and thus I was induced to pay a visit. The first part of the programme was occupied by a musical piece entitled "The Wreck of the Argosy," but neither the composition, or the performance call for any special notice. The second part was taken up by a grand musical spectacle "The Rose Queen"; this, I think, requires a little comment. The music comprises a mixture of Macfarren's "May Day" and Bennett's "May Queen"; it also contains selections from Bishop, Blumenthal, and Mendelssohn, together with commonplace tunes for skipping-rope, and eccentric dances, and conventional arrangements for a "Corps de Ballet" (8 in number); this was to be performed with full stage effect. Before remarking on the performance, I would wish to say a few words to this effect. At one time a lover is serenading his mistress, but has his back turned on her, all through his love refrain. Again, the stage is crowded with choristers, ballet girls, and country clod-poles (a strange combination truly), while the majority of the chorus evidently not accustomed to the stage or stage clothing, stroll about at leisure regardless of anything or anybody, in the midst of which a lady walks on, and without any apparent reason, obliges with a song. It is also somewhat embarrassing to see a priest associating with ballet girls; it may be all right off the stage, but on the "boards" it does not look well. I must, however, pass on to something more serious than these comparatively petty faults. Can anyone imagine, who has the slightest artistic taste, Mendelssohn's lovely trio, "Lift thine eyes," figuring in the same programme as "A Skipping-rope dance by Little Flo," but thus it was. Again, I do maintain that it shows lack of respect, and want of refinement, to have an eccentric dance by three exhilarated villagers follow on immediately after the performance of Bennett's beautiful trio which occurs in his Cantata. Variety, which is proverbially charming, was (to me) most objectionable and irritating. Such things are not consistent with artistic ideas.

With regard to the actual performance—I must commend Mrs. Merton Clark for her very careful and artistic rendering of "Lo! here the gentle lark." The rendering of "My Queen," by Mr. J. Wenham Walker, the aforenamed impolite wooer, was not altogether satisfactory. Mr. Lansmere sang his music with great care, but I would remind him that the art of acting does not consist of rushing about all over the stage. Miss Annie Daymond "The Rose Queen," sang her music very tastefully. With regard to the ballet (alas!) considering their small number, they went through their usual movements with success. The choir, in one or two instances did their work (musically) admirably. The singing all through seemed to be much appreciated by "Ye Gods." This kind of thing, without such depressing stage effects, is all right, and tends, no doubt, to do a lot of good; but when lovely music is burlesqued, and lovers turn their backs on those they are supposed to love, when ballet girls not only become the companions of choristers, but hover around the steps of a sacred edifice—then such performances become detrimental to artistic progress. I should wish to impress upon the management of Thursday week, that with ignorant people, no art suffers from association, like music. Bennett's "May Queen" was performed without orchestral parts. Why was this

WELLINGTON BARRACKS.

A Military Harvest Festival was held last Sunday at the Wellington Barracks. At the evening service the three bands of the Foot Guards, with the choir formed of soldiers, boys and men, took part in the Festival. The effect of the wind instruments as employed at the ordinary services of this chapel is remarkably effective and striking. The harmonies produced are so firm and rich, as to point out that much may be done in Service Music by the judicious employment of wind instruments, especially in conjunction with the organ. It may be well to remind readers that the public are admitted every Sunday to the services at the Wellington Barracks. The morning service is at 10.30, and visitors should be in their places a little before that time.

LEEDS.

(From our own Correspondent).

The Carl Rosa Opera Company were at the Grand Theatre last week, and the production of the new operas, "Esmeralda" and "Colomba" was looked forward to with much interest, every available seat having been booked in advance, while on each night the house was crowded. The cast in "Esmeralda" was the same as when the piece was originally brought out at Drury Lane a few months ago. Madame Georgina Burns delighted every one by her fine acting in the title rôle, while as a vocalist she has few equals on the operatic stage.

In Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," the title character was entrusted to Madame Marie Rose, who was in splendid voice, and acted magnificently, and at the close of the long, trying scene in the finale to the third act, she was received with loud applause. Miss Clara Perry, as Chilina, sang the beautiful "vocero" with much expression, and Mr. Barton McGuckin's fine tenor voice was heard to advantage in the music allotted to Orso. Both operas were splendidly mounted. Madame Marie Rose also appeared in "Trovatore" and "Carmen."

Dr. Spark's recital on the Town Hall organ last Saturday evening was devoted to reminiscences of the Musical Festival, and was well attended. The programme included, among other items, selections from the "Elijah," from Barnby's 97th Psalm, and from Raff's oratorio, "The End of the World," and though the latter work is unsuited to the organ, those who were not at the Festival would be able to form some idea of the kind of music that has excited so much interest and controversy. The "War March of Priests" from "Athalie" brought the concert to a close. The same programme was repeated on Tuesday. Prior to the recital, a presentation was made to Dr. Spark as a token of esteem from his past and present pupils, the presentation taking the form of a handsome album, which contained the portraits of several of his numerous pupils. At the presentation there were present the Rev. Canon Bullock, Vicar of Holy Trinity (who presided), and others. The Rev. Chairman, in presenting the birthday token, expressed his great pleasure at having afforded to him an opportunity of publicly expressing his appreciation of the great services rendered to the town by Dr. Spark. He spoke of the fact that Dr. Spark had had the honour of imparting some instruction in oratorio music to the late Mdlle. Titiens. Dr. Spark was not only famous as a teacher and as a musician, but also as a composer. The rev. gentleman presented the album to the Doctor amid much applause. Mr. Oldroyd, an old friend of the Borough Organist, endorsed all the remarks of Canon Bullock, and bore his testimony both to the private worth and public work of Dr. Spark. Dr. Spark, on rising to acknowledge the present, was received with great enthusiasm. In the course of his reply he said it was a pleasant thing to find that, after a career of twenty-five years, containing its usual share of difficulties and misrepresentations, so kind a present should have been made to him by his old and present pupils.

SOUTHAMPTON.

Says a local journal, a large audience assembled in the Hartley Hall on Oct. 25th, to hear Dr. Arnold's "Sennacherib." The different numbers were received with marked discrimination and acceptance, beginning at the picturesque march following the orchestral prelude introducing the work, and culminating in, for a Southampton audience, the rare re-demand of the chorus in about the middle of the cantata, "O Lord Thou art great"—a solid piece of writing, which the chorus of 150 voices brought together from the two towns gave with marked vivacity and power. It was introduced by a charming duet, "O house of Jacob" for soprano and tenor, in which these solo voices were heard to their best; the band, however, which, composed for the most part of the players at the Gloucester festival, had necessarily been brought together without practice in a body, manifesting considerable unsteadiness and uncertainty in the other chief concerted piece for the soloists, a trio, "O Lord God of Hosts," leading to a smooth piece of four-part harmony for the chorus, "Save us out of his hand." A song of triumph for the soprano, "God breaketh the battles," well written for the display of the voice, and powerfully given by Mdlle. Avigliana, who sang the music at Gloucester, led to the final chorus, containing a fugue, commencing with the words "His name alone is excellent," the work concluding with a sound piece of writing, "The sword of the enemy"—a form of thanksgiving to the Almighty. The hearty applause which greeted Dr. Arnold, who conducted the performance, both at the close, when the chorus markedly supplemented the plaudits of the audience, and following individual numbers of the work, testified the gratification which the cantata gave.

WINCHESTER.

A large audience was present at the Guildhall on Oct. 26th at Dr. Arnold's concert. The principal interest centered in the first part, which was taken up entirely by "Sennacherib," a sacred cantata from the pen of the conductor, which was first produced at the last Gloucester Festival. The solo parts were taken, as on the previous evening, at Southampton, by Mdlle. Avigliana and Messrs. H. Kearton and W. H. Brereton. The band, led by Mr. Fletcher, though not complete, was sufficient to indicate many of the beauties of the instrumentation, which is very elaborate throughout. The chorus of 170 voices was much strengthened by a contingent from Southampton. The choruses showed signs of careful rehearsal, and left nothing to be desired in their performance—in fact, a better choral performance has never been heard in Winchester. The hearty reception of Dr. Arnold, and frequent applause, showed that the verdict of the public on this, his last work, was a favourable one.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent).

Oct. 31.

The initial of the series of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestral concerts took place last evening in the Philharmonic Hall. There was a crowded attendance.

The programme was enjoyable, containing as it did Beethoven's first symphony, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, overture to "Oberon," &c.

An interesting work of Dvorak's for the orchestra (Rhapsodie Slave, in G minor, Op. 45, No. 3) was given for the first time. It is characteristic of the composer and a refreshing change from the ordinary colour scoring.

Madame Norman-Néruda was the solo violinist, and in addition to the charming interpretation of Mendelssohn's concerto, essayed a Sonata of Rust's. It is very antiquated, but makes a good violin item, and certainly requires a good player and clever executant. Need I chronicle the reception given to the gifted lady who played this suite (for it is not a sonata) in such a perfect style? No! enough, that it was played (and it embraces a fugue almost without any accompaniment) by Madame Norman-Néruda. The vocalist was Miss Thudichum who sang with great success Meyerbeer's "Come rapido" ("Il Crociato"), Handel's "Lusinghe piu care," and Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming" (which last, by-the-way, seems to be a favourite with Royal Academy students of the fair sex).

Sir Julius Benedict presided at the Royal Academy of Music's local distribution on the 22nd inst., and made some very pertinent remarks. The following notes upon his speech contain the whole thing in a nutshell:—"How is it that a city of the dimensions and wealth of Liverpool is so lamentably behind in everything connected with the most entrancing of all arts? Are we to suppose that the merchants of Liverpool are less intellectual than the cotton spinners of Manchester or the wool weavers of Leeds. Or to take a nearer parallel, Bristol, with little more than one-third the population, can set on foot a musical festival to which Liverpool can show no rival. Some cause there must be for such a marked inferiority, and it probably lies in a lack of the sympathy and spirit of mutual co-operation, which is necessary to draw into a focus the individual atoms that must exist in so large a community. The result we see in the fact, so feelingly alluded to by Mr. Palgrave Simpson, that Liverpool cannot produce an orchestra of her own, but has to import one from Manchester, and to place the affairs of her principal musical society under the absolute control and direction of a Manchester conductor, without regard to the competent representation of works of the highest order. Of course, if Liverpudlians choose to submit to such a humiliating state of things it does not concern the remainder of the empire in any way. But there are in Liverpool many to whom the making such a confession is a cause of shame and heart-burning. It is for them to combine together to remove such a reproach from their city, and it cannot be but that by strenuous exertion and patient perseverance it could in time be done. The Philharmonic Society has abdicated its position as a distinctly local leader in music. Its old place is untenanted. Will none step forth to assume the mantle it has cast away?"

Messrs. Alfred Burnett and Ridley Prentice announce their intention of giving another series of their excellent chamber concerts at the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, during the coming winter. Four concerts will, it is said, be given, and the programme of each evening is to include one work by an English composer.

GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The programme of Mr. Charles Hallé's concert on Oct. 19th, was as follows :—

Fantaisie Sonata in G, Op. 78	Schubert.
Solo (violin) "Fantaisie caprice"	Vieuxtemps.
Duet (pf. and violin) Andante and Rondo	Mozart.
Sonata in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2	Beethoven.
Berceuse in D flat	Chopin-Gluck.
Larghetto in A	Nardini.
Polonaise in A	Wieniawski.

Mr. Hallé was assisted by Madme. Norman-Néruda, and performed with his usual power to an appreciative audience.

A most satisfactory performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given by the Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society, on October 25th, to a crowded audience. The soloists were Mdlle. Ilma de Murska, Mr. Leonard E. Auty, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The orchestra was composed of local performers, under the leadership of Mr. T. Smyth, and the style of the rendition was all that could be desired. Dr. Peace was organist, and Mr. W. M. Miller, as usual, conducted. The chief noticeable defects in the choral portions of the work were an occasional lack of sympathy or unanimity between the various parts, and a decided weakness among the tenors. In other respects, the performance was highly successful, and Mr. Auty secured the inevitable encore for the air "In native worth." Mdlle. de Murska was not so happy in her singing if she had been in the more congenial sphere of opera, and her quality of voice has manifestly deteriorated since she formerly sang in Scotland. The society are rehearsing for production Handel's "Athaliah" and "Messiah."

The Glasgow Select Choir gave a performance of Smart's "Jacob" in the City Hall, and again manifested the power to do justice to choral works of considerable size and difficulty. The present performance was an advance in some slight particulars on the former production of the work, and the choral portions of the work were faultless. The solos were likewise commendably good, and the accompaniments by Messrs. Swan (harmonium), and Berry (piano), were able and judicious. Mr. Allan conducted. The choir is expected to appear twice in London this season, and we believe, thanks to the untiring zeal and energy of the conductor, that an improvement on some of the features of the choral singing will be apparent.

The scheme of the Saturday evening concerts in St. Andrew's Hall, past and to come, includes among other singers and performers, the following : Miss Mary Davies, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss K. W. Payne, Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Agnes Larkcom, Madme. Isabel Fassett, Miss M. Mackenzie, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. George Perren, Mr. R. Hollins, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. B. Foote, Mr. C. King, Mr. R. Hilton, Mr. T. Beale, Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Miss Marie Schumann, Dr. A. L. Peace and many others.

Madam Helen Hopekirk is announced to give a farewell concert previous to her departure for America. The Council of the Choral Union have republished for circulation among the members an aid to the comprehension of Berlioz's "Messe des Morts," in the shape of an article which appeared in the Saturday Review.

STEPNEY.

A fine organ has been erected by Messrs. Peter Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield, in Stepney Meeting House, one of the oldest of the Nonconformist churches in London. The instrument has three manuals and Pedal and some thirty-one mounted stops. The case is of pitch pine, with eighty-five speaking pipes. The whole presents a very handsome appearance, and the tone of the organ is exceptionally good. In accordance with the Puritan traditions of the church, the organ was opened with a somewhat grave service, in which a sermon, by Dr. Allon of Islington, took a prominent part. Mr. Minshall, of the City Temple, presided at the organ.

LAMBETH ROAD.

A notably fine organ, by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, at the Upton Chapel, Lambeth Road, was opened on October 31st. The vocalists were Miss Roby, Miss Williams, Messrs. Cornwall and Chaplin Henry. Mr. E. H. Turpin was the solo organist, and Mr. W. Taylor, of St. Matthew's, New Kent Road, was the accompanist.

BEDFORD.

An organ recital was given at the Wesley Chapel on Tuesday, October 16th, by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O. The vocalists were Miss Carter and Mr. Margeson. Movements by Bach, Wesley, Guilmant, Wely, and Lux were played.

BROAD GREEN.

An organ recital was given in Christ Church, by Mr. F. Cambridge, on Thursday, October 18th. The programme was as follows :—

Overture. "Samson"	Handel.
Sanctus, "Messe Solennelle"	Gounod.
Fugue on "St. Ann's Tune"	Bach.
Andante in F (Dramatic Concerto)	Spohr.
Triumphal March in D	Moscheles.
Selection, "Athalie"	Mendelssohn.
Hallelujah, "Mount of Olives"	Beethoven.

BRIGHTON.

The Corporation organ recitals were given in the Dome, Royal Pavilion, by Mr. J. Crapps, F.C.O., on Saturday, October 20th. The programme included :—

Sonate Pontificale Allegro moderato—Adagio—March Pontificale.	Lemmens.
Grand Fantasia and Fugue in A minor	Bach.
Cantaline Pastorale, Op. 15	Guilmant.
Grand Study, "Hosannah"	Lemmens.
Fantasia for Organ, on Mozart's celebrated duet in "Il Flauto Magico"	Hepworth.
Grand Offertoire in F No. 6	Batiste.
Air varie, Allegretto in B flat	Lissant.
"War March of the Priests" ("Athalie")	Steggall.

Mr. Crapps's performance is spoken of as in every way admirable.

ALYTH.

An organ recital was given in the Episcopal Church, on Thursday, October 18th, by Mr. C. J. Smith. The programme included :—

Largo in B flat	Smith.
Prelude and Fugue in F	Bach.
"March of the Crusaders"	Sibley.
Overture to "Athalia"	Handel.
Andante in G	Batiste.
"Tuba Mirum" (Requiem)	Mozart.
Andante (1st Concerto)	Mendelssohn.
Largo (Violin and Organ	Handel.
"Wedding March"	Mendelssohn.

The organ recitals at Holy Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road, will be recommenced on Sunday next, by Mr. Stretton Swann, and will be continued during the winter season, on the first Sunday in every month, after the evening Service.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The soloist on Saturday was Dr. Peace of Glasgow; in whose performance there is nothing to criticise but everything to admire. The calm mastery and high finish of his playing, which so forcibly struck the present writer upon the first appearance here of the eminent organist, were upon the present occasion abundantly displayed. The pieces given were the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley's fine Sonata No. 2; Rondo in A minor and major, (G. Morandi); Bach's great Toccata and Fugue in F; "Rhapsodie," No. 3, Saint-Saëns; and overture, "The Erl King" (Kuhlau). The vocalist was Miss Emily Jones, who was encored in Hullah's "The Storm"; Mr. Fountain Meen accompanied. To-night a pianoforte recital will be given by Herr Bonawitz, aided by sundry well known string players, with Miss A. South as vocalist. It cannot now be more than recorded that an excellent rendering of Dr. J. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalene" was given on Tuesday last at the Institute. The performance was given under Mr. W. G. McNaught, by the choir of the Institute, now an admirable and enthusiastic body of singers, doing excellent work from time to time in the cause of the art. The orchestra was a thoroughly representative one, and the entire performance was another good thing scored to the credit of the Institute. The esteemed composer of the new work played the organ part.

FISHERIES EXHIBITION.

Mr. Ernest Slater, R.A.M., A.C.O., organist of Lambeth Parish Church, gave an organ recital on Monday, October 29th. The folllowing is the programme :—

Chorus, "Heaven and earth display"	Mendelssohn.
Andante in F	Batiste.
Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Andante in F sharp minor	Wesley.
"War March of the Priests"	Mendelssohn.
Andante and Fugue	Slater.
Grand Chorus	Guilmant.
Andante in F	Smart.
Chorus, "And the glory of the Lord"	Handel.

BOLTON.

An organ recital was given in the Albert Hall, by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., on Saturday, October 20th. The following was the programme :—

Prelude and Fugue in C minor	Bach.
Andante from the Symphony in C major	Mozart.
The "Bell Offertoire"	Batiste.
Overture for the organ in F minor	Morandi.
Song, "The Chorister"	Sullivan.
March Posthume	Rossini.

SHEFFIELD.

Mr. James Hallé gave a recital on the grand organ on Saturday, October 20th, at the Albert Hall. The Yorkshire St. Cecilia Quartet, of Leeds, made their first appearance upon this occasion. The programme included :—

Overture, "Semiramide"	Rossini.
Barcarolle in F (4th Piano Concerto)	Bennett.
Grand Fantasia, "The Storm"	Lemmens.
"Improvisations on National Airs"
Grand Offertoire in C minor	Batiste.
"Tannhäuser" March	Wagner.

CORK INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

On Saturday, the 13th inst., the Exhibition was opened to the public for the last time. There was no closing ceremony, properly speaking, a series of military bands playing throughout the day doing duty for it. The attendance was immense, everybody wishing to have a last look before the place was closed. At three o'clock Mr. T. J. Sullivan performed the following selection on the organ :—

Overture, "Zauberflöte"	Mozart.
Irish Melodies	Moore.
Selection, "Maritana"	Wallace.
Andante con moto, Symphony in C minor	Beethoven.
Allegretto, from "Hymn of Praise"	Mendelssohn.
Hallelujah Chorus, "Messiah"	Handel.

At four o'clock the combined bands of five regiments played—

British Army Quadrilles	Jullien.
Grand March, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner.
Overture, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber.
Fantasia, "Reminiscences of Ireland"	Godfrey.

A somewhat similar programme was performed in the evening, with the exception of the substitution of a selection played by a military band for the organ recital.

Mr. Cowen's visit to America to conduct some of his own works has, it is stated, been postponed.

"THE COMING OPERA."

PASSING EVENTS. The Querist, Service Lists, &c.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1883.

A NOTABLE PROGRAMME.

THE esteemed conductor Mr. A. MANNS and the authorities of the Crystal Palace achieved a quiet, but none the less significant triumph on Saturday by the successful performance of a genuine English programme. The leading feature was Sir G. A. MACFARREN'S Symphony in E minor, written years ago for the then existing British Musical Society. This fine work, with its finely expressed thoughts, its admirably contrasted movements and sound musicianship, astonished not a few present last Saturday who had perhaps overlooked the existence of the work. Sir R. P. STEWART'S excellently scored and characteristic Prelude to "The Eve of St. John" proved a most welcome novelty. Sir H. OAKELEY'S vigorous "Edinburgh" March was also found worthy of a place in the Crystal Palace scheme.

To speak of the brightness, gaiety and freshness of Sir A. SULLIVAN'S overture, "Di Ballo," is now to talk of a fully accepted delight. It is well, perhaps, to say that satisfactory as the entire selection of English music proved to be on the occasion now referred to, the programme also served to show how much good English music is still being neglected, and that the Crystal Palace authorities have yet much to do in the way of making amends for long continued sins of omission. The performance at an early date of one of the late Sir JOHN GOSS's much neglected and musicianly orchestral works, is one thing to be looked for. There is nothing boastful in the assertion that at the present time, England can produce music not to be excelled, and in some respects even hardly to be equalled, by the music of any other existing school. The result of last Saturday's selection was a proof of the truth of the assertion. The word school now-a-days, be it remembered, implies little more than the grouping together of a national musical party; for the universal language, music, has naturally, in this period of the quick electric intercourse of thought, led the way in the interchange and mutual adoption of idioms. But, though all modern music seems destined to wear the same universal tokens of thought kinship, the obligation of the distinct cultivation and encouragement of its own national school of music which rests upon each separate nationality is not a whit the less serious. We have long in England welcomed all men of genius and their works; but this feeling has, through divers causes not now to be discussed, been carried to a length which has stultified and degraded our own home art productions. We have laid ourselves open by our want of discernment to an invasion of all kinds of second and third rate composers, conducting adventurers who confidently come to lead our own bands for us with more or less success, and legions of singers and players, who can show no claims which can in any way justify the heedless, cruel, silly neglect of our own native artists. Now, we are happily modifying our policy; not rejecting all that is really good that is brought to us, for England ever has an open, generous hand, but learning to better appreciate and reward our own true artists; who have to accuse us in their noble, patient, striving attitude of bitterly neglecting a precious heritage of goodly gifts and earnest cultivation. It is therefore to be hoped that the example set at the Crystal Palace on Saturday last will be followed far and wide.

FORM IN VOCAL MUSIC.

IX.

IN setting the great Church Hymn the "Te Deum laudamus," due regard must of course be maintained as to the character of the Services in which it is to be used. The hymn indeed has quite a distinct use in the Anglican Church from that which prevails in the Roman and some other branches of the Christian Church. Whilst in the English Church the "Te Deum laudamus" forms an abiding feature in the daily form of morning prayer, elsewhere it has a special character and a reserved employment for great occasions and special festivals. So the settings by HAYDN, GRAUN, ROMBERG, and others do not exactly furnish models for the English Church composer, any more indeed than do the almost parallel settings in English by PURCELL, HANDEL, and quite recently by Sir A. SULLIVAN. It may here be observed, however, that no feature of our too long morning Services displays so painfully the weak compression of the musical portion of the office as does the hurried, brief setting generally made to the words of the "Te Deum." The great imagery of its different clauses, its varied attitudes of praise and prayer and points of doctrinal exposition, cannot be justly dealt with in the ordinary brief, compressed musical scamper which forms the "Te Deum" in most of our English Services. Such unworthy treatment of impressive words would be impossible anywhere but in an English Church; alas! that this is so. How to offer suggestions to the student as to the treatment of the glorious hymn to a musical setting which could find no favour, save upon the condition that it is to be written so as to be rattled through in about five minutes, is indeed an anomalous perplexity I have no intention of trying to solve. At the same time it is necessary that any setting intended for ordinary Anglican use shall be fairly in keeping with the surrounding conditions and elements of frequent public worship.

E. H. TURPIN.

THE ITALIAN OPERA IN BOTH WORLDS.

OUR learned contemporary of the Times has returned to the charge, and favoured the public with a most interesting article on the future of "Italian Opera in "England and America," suggested by the recent opening of the "New Metropolitan Opera House" in New York, said to be one of the largest and most magnificently appointed theatres in the world. Here, on the opening night, Mdme. CHRISTINE NILSSON, who sang in GOUNOD'S "Faust," received the present of a real golden girdle. On the same night our old friend Colonel J. H. MAPLESON began his season at the "Academy of Music," hitherto the home of Italian opera in New York, with Mdme. GERSTER as his prima donna, and a splendid success rewarded the fair Hungarian lady's remarkable vocal achievements. The shrewd writer in the Times, on these premisses, proceeds to discuss the question whether the "in-"genuous reader"—(as much a rara avis as the "intelligent foreigner,")—can discover in these events the beginning of a new era in the history of Italian opera in America; and whether—for this is really a main question—this fashionable Institution will recover in the New World the ground that it has notoriously lost in the Old.

A musical pessimist (continues the writer of the article in the Times), well acquainted with the ways and means of modern opera, would probably be the reverse of sanguine. For a very sufficient reason. Under the existing most absurd, even abominable, "Star" system, the expenses of an Opera house are so enormous that an impresario must be a veritable millionaire, like Mr. VANDERBILT, the presenter of the golden girdle, if he would secure a "public" by engaging eminent prime donne at fabulous prices.

Digitized by Google

To Mdme. ADELINA PATTI it is said that Colonel MAPLESON has made the unprecedented offer of £1,100 a night; and how, it is pertinently asked, could even the most crowded houses under such circumstances pay expenses and yield a profit? The old plan of a "first lady" and four dolls, will no longer answer, for even the poupées expect to be well paid; the chorus and band, moreover, must be first-rate, and are not to be had for nothing. It is thought, therefore, that the matter resolves itself into a financial struggle between Col. MAPLESON and Mr. ABBEY, and that the final victory of the Metropolitan Opera house or the Academy will depend upon the amount of available "chink."

But this is a side issue: the main point, the future prospects of Italian opera in the abstract, remains for consideration. This main point involves two secondary questions. There is on one hand, an almost ruinous expenditure on "Stars" and manifold modern necessities; on the other, a growing indifference of the public to the old form and style of "Italian" opera pure and simple.

The Times, notwithstanding a tendency to pessimism, opines that the magnitude of the evil as regards expenses will make its speedy removal "a matter of "absolute and immediate necessity." "The prima- "donna, to speak plainly, is no longer worth the "money she asks. The intelligent portion of the "public has at last grown tired of old-fashioned operas "indifferently mounted, for the sake merely of serving "as a foil to the salti mortali of accomplished singers." The two or three great vocalists who still draw large audiences by their own unsupported efforts are not likely to have any successors. After quoting the precedent of a male figurante in the "Ballet" once à-la-mode at the "King's Theatre" in the Haymarket, it is suggested that the modern prima donna may, at no distant date, be as unknown as the male dancer. Great singers, of course will be required, engaged, and fairly remunerated, but not according to mere tricks of technical skill, or at the expense of high works of art, of which after all, they are only the interpreters.

The writer of the essay in the Times has no faith in these grand doings on the other side of the broad Atlantic. He looks nearer home. Mr. Gye, of our own "Royal Italian" Opera, is reminded of certain facts. He has no CRŒSUS like Mr. VANDERBILT at his back, but he is supported by a clientèle of "con- "servative subscribers," and he has the field to himself for the present. All that is needed is an intelligent selection of operas, ancient and modern, provided with due attention to a perfect ensemble of which individual great artists shall form important, but not all-engrossing components.

So far the Times. Concurring with the writer on the main point, it may be thought that a monopoly is not the most likely stepping-stone to a radical reform of the existing system, whilst the precedents of past seasons hardly inspire very sanguine hopes. Rather let us look to the healthy stimulus of fair competition; to a second or third opera house established on sound cosmopolitan principles; above all to the permanent performances of companies such as Herr FRANKE and Mr. CARL ROSA have already brought before the public; the latter with success so signal, notwithstanding his English libretti and English artists. At all events, the repertoire of opera must be enlarged so as to include WAGNER (properly interpreted), and all eminent modern composers of the continent, especially the German school. "For each and for all," should be the director's motto. Let all tastes be suited, but as the chorus in the "Agamemnon" of ÆSCHYLUS, repeatedly exclaim, "Let the good prevail and con- "quer."

High Festival Communion Service. By George Carter. (Novello, Ewer, & Co).—Mr. George Carter, a brother of Mr. William Carter, was formerly organist of St. Luke's, Chelsea, and the Cathedral of Montreal in Canada. He is also honourably known as a composer of Cantatas, two whereof, "Evangeline" and a "Sinfonia Cantata" on Psalm CXVI, have already been published. Mr. Carter has "on the anvil" another Cantata suggested by Longfellow's later poem "The Golden Legend."

This Communion Service in E major has been heard at St. Paul's Cathedral and other churches. On Sunday, Oct. 14th, the writer had the pleasure of hearing the Service at St. Matthias, South Kensington, where the organist, Mr. Mallitt Jones, has a capital choir under his control. The Service comprises the "Kyrie Eleison," the "Credo," the "Sanctus," the "Benedictus," the "Agnus Dei," and the final "Gloria in Excelsis." On Sunday, Oct. 14, for reasons, the "Agnus Dei" had to be omitted. Mr. G. Carter has composed a very interesting and excellent work, full of striking contrasts, learned, yet never dry, a clever combination of the old severer style of Anglican Church music with the more florid modern forms of thought brought into fashion by Gounod and the French School. The short "Kyrie" (after the Commandments), has been set in the key of G, and the "Gratia Tibi" (after the Gospel) in B major. The "Credo" in E major, a very fine and bold movement, is remarkable for a correct emphasizing of the passage "God of God, Light of Light," &c., by means of the unison, and the same device marks the declaration of the Father and the Son's consubstantiality; here the harmony changes to F sharp minor, but reverts at the clause "By Whom all things were made," to E major. The tenor and bass sing (quasi recitative) "Who for us men," and the bass (solo), intones the "Incarnatus;" the chorus enter at the clause "And was made man," with a pause on the chord of C sharp major; the alto then sings the words "And was crucified." Here occur some striking harmonic progressions and bits of contrapuntal imitation on a discord of the diminished seventh. At the "Resurrection" episode comes a fugue, led off by the sopranos and afterwards produced by the basses in the forms known as "inversion" and "augmentation." A florid accompaniment of quavers, which begins the "Credo," is resumed at the second paragraph of the Creed, "And I believe in the Holy Ghost," and the bass (of organ) moves contrapuntally independent of the voice parts. The concluding passage "And I look," &c, is in the alla capella style, with full chords for organ, and the fugue is resumed (stretto), at the final clause. A plagal cadence, where the extraneous notes D natural and C natural have been used effectively in the tenor part, brings out the closing chord of E major with happy prominence and emphasis.

The "Sanctus" in A major and 3-4 time, is a smooth and tuneful movement, opened by the tenor solo with a pretty flowing accompaniment (afterwards transferred to the bass). At the "full" occurs a change to G sharp major; the moving figure of accompaniment was well played by Mr. Mallitt Jones. The voices sing the final "Glory be to Thee, O Lord" in unison, and an ingenious suggestion or suspicion of the key of B flat incidentally colours the text.

The "Benedictus" in C major, is opened by the tenor solo on the lowest pedal bass for the organ; an (orchestral) harp effect is produced by the "harmonic flute" on the great organ. The choir make a grand climax at the end of the second page on the chord of E flat, and at the "Hosanna" comes a short fugato accompanied by a florid counterpoint on the pedals, continued by the "trumpet stop," here happily used by the composer. Some horn effects are rendered by the "swell reeds." The sopranos sing the final words "In the highest," to the notes C, the high A, and the high G natural (held as semibreves). The "Agnus Dei" in A, esteemed by the composer the most important part of this particular Service, most felicitously combines the penitential and prayerful with the more tuneful cantabile style; phrases in D and E minor ex. gra., are succeeded by responses in C major, a most graphic representation of the "Peace of God" after the agony of appeal to the Lamb. Frivolity is carefully avoided; the choir end in unison. The "Gloria in Excelsis" in C, opens with a brilliant chromatic phrase of octaves, followed (when the voices enter), with a forte of ponderous chords. The quasi andante at the words "In earth peace," where the voices are in unison for two bars, has a delicious effect; this unison has been subsequently employed without accompaniment, but the organ takes "revenge" in a brilliant passage for the pedals. The words of the "Gloria" suggest a marked contrast of jubilant tone with prayerful tenderness, and the composer has not been slow to avail himself of this opportunity. At the end of the clause "At the right hand of the Father" the soprani skip from high G to C, and Mr. Carter, like Beethoven, in the concluding chorus of the "Mount of Olives," interrupts the cadence with a chord of the 6-4-2 on B flat which he resolves on the first inversion of F minor, but not finally. The opening theme of the "Gloria" is resumed at the passage "For Thou only," but without the brilliant chromatic passage, which Mr. Carter reserves for the "Amen." The cadence is plagal, but the chord F major is followed by a feint of D minor, and is resolved really as a chord of the 6-4-3, on a tonic pedal (C). Mr. Carter, in his various keys, has always retained the note E natural. The organ stops (some of those referred to), are "analogues" of the orchestral score. Performances in a church may not be criticised, but it is only fair to report favourably of the organist and the choir at St. Matthias. Many difficult passages and some long "skips" are written for the voices, and these were well seized. The tenor soloist, too, deserves commendation for his part of the service.

On Sunday, Oct. 21st, Mr. Mallit Jones performed Schubert's fine Mass in G, and used the one in B flat. On Oct. 28th, the Festival of St. Simon and St. Jude. On Sunday evening Mr. Jones played, as a postludium, Léfébure Wély's splendid Offertorium in G major, and many of the congregation remained to hear this popular piece of organ music.

2. Harmonise a given theme in the tenor, in G minor, in three different ways, for eight voices, in open score and proper clefs.
3. Write twenty-four bars on a given short ground bass of four bars in six vocal parts, inclusive of the bass, never repeating the same harmonic treatment.
4. Analyse passages from various points of view, which are extracted from the finale of Beethoven's Sonata in B flat, Op. 22, and from Mozart's Quintet in E flat, No. 5.

COUNTERPOINT, &C.

1. Add seven upper parts to a given Canto Fermo in G minor, all strictly in counterpoint of the first species, in open score and in proper clefs.
2. Compose a fugue in D major, in simple triple time, on two original subjects, introducing counterpoints at the octave, tenth, and twelfth, and any other ingenious devices. It must not be less than thirty or more than forty bars in length.
3. Continue and conclude either of two given canons, in sixteen bars.

INSTRUMENTATION AND ACOUSTICS.

1. Give the formula for finding equal temperament.
2. Explain the characteristics of the various systems of unequal temperament (e. g. Kirnberger's, Euler's, Herschell's), or the system of absolutely pure intervals.
3. Give the fractions representing the ordinary comma, the Pythagorean comma, and the Enharmonic diesis; and explain the meaning of those terms.
4. Give a list of the principal overtones (or harmonics) of G, and shew which of these are available in practical harmony.
5. Explain the phenomena of the vibrations of:—i. Stretched strings; ii. Flue-pipes; iii. Reed-pipes; iv. Plates (square or circular); v. Stretched membranes.
6. Harmonise a given melody in E minor, for two violins, two violas, violoncello, and double bass, introducing imitations, &c.
7. Score a given sketch in B minor, the melody and a figured bass being set, for full orchestra, introducing imitations, &c.

SECOND EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR IN MUSIC.

HARMONY.

1. Add an alto and tenor part in their respective clefs to a given melody in D minor.
2. Add four upper parts in their proper clefs to a given figured bass in E flat, and give roots.
3. Harmonise a given passage for five voices, imitating as nearly as possible the Church style of Palestrina, the treble and bass of fourteen bars from Palestrina's "Dixit Dominus" being set.
4. Add three parts, in short score, to a given figured bass in A flat.
5. Explain certain bars marked in a given passage from Pierson's "Jerusalem," giving roots, &c.

COUNTERPOINT AND FUGUE.

1. Write simultaneous counterpoints of the third and fourth species on a Canto Fermo in F, together making three parts.
2. Add four parts in the first species to the bass Canto Fermo in D.
3. Write a short fugue in four parts on a given subject in F, pronounced by the tenor for the first time, and introduce the subject by inversion.
4. Give tonal answers to four given subjects.

HISTORY, INSTRUMENTAL, &C.

1. Give a list of the principal Madrigalian composers in England during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and James I.
2. Give the name and date of the work which first introduced the Italian Madrigalian composers to the English public.
3. What was the influence of the Commonwealth upon music, and the progress of the art in England?
3. What kind of overture did Lully prefix to his operas? Was his method followed by any great composers in other countries?
5. What was the "Beggar's Opera"? Who compiled it? What influence had it on English Art?
6. What celebrated compositions have been written in upwards of sixteen real vocal parts?
7. Give examples of the effective employment of the piccolo.

8. In one of his oratorios Handel has written unusually difficult passages for horn and trumpet in the introductory symphony of a chorus. Give the names of both chorus and oratorio.

9. Name any instances in which the usual form of the finale of a symphony has not been adhered to.

10. State the several methods in which the two treble parts, the alto, tenor, and the bass parts of a vocal quintet may be scored for the stringed quartet and the double bass.

11. Describe the leading characteristics of J. S. Bach's organ sonatas, and of Mendelssohn's organ sonatas.

12. Arrange the Old Hundredth Psalm tune as follows :—i. with the melody for a solo stop, accompanied by varied harmonies ; ii. for full organ in simple harmony. Both examples with pedal obbligato.

13. Define rhythm in its fullest meaning as applied to musical composition.

RAPHAEL'S MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

In Messrs. J. A. Crowe and G. B. Cavalcaselle's "Raphael: his Life and Works," the account of his sketches for the Assumption or Coronation of the Virgin is as follows :—"One of the boys plays the tambourine. Another pose of the same youth yields an angel playing a pocket-viol. But instead of looking up, as we find him in the Pesth design, he looks down musingly, and the slight interval which parts the two drawings in date of execution indicates the moment when the idea of an 'Assumption' was given up and that of a 'Coronation of the Virgin' was adopted, for in the 'Coronation' the tambourine player bends his face towards the ground, and not towards the sky. Hardly had the original design been put aside when Raphael recomposed the whole of it. He lightly threw on a sheet, now at Lille, two contours of boys, one of whom sits and prays with joined hands, whilst the other likewise sits and holds a crown over his neighbour's head. Hastily drawn with a pen, this sketch scarcely looks so good as Raphael should have made it. Better, yet also from the model, and with very rapid strokes, Raphael outlined a boy touching the strings of a mandoline, which he put aside for one playing a violin, on the skeleton of whose frame the drapery hangs in folds, flapping in the wind. Both sketches on the same paper are exhibited at Lille. Even these efforts did not prove entirely suitable ; the head of the boy had been bent to the left ; a better effect might be got if it were turned to the right. A model now sat, but only for the head and the hand, with the bow. The type of the face, in itself lovely, is realized with marvellous skill, and this perfect and inimitable study adorns the British Museum. To the left of the Virgin and Christ in the 'Coronation,' the studies for the tambourine and viol players at Lille do service, but in this wise, that whereas the latter stands to the left and the former to the right in the design, their position is reversed in the picture—the viol is turned into a harp, and both figures are clothed in ample drapery."

The new work, "Voice, Song, and Speech," by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, advertised to appear on the 1st of November, will be delayed for a few days in consequence of Messrs. Putnam and Sons of New York, having taken half the first edition on condition that publications in this country be postponed for fourteen days after the date of shipping to America, so that the work may make its appearance simultaneously in both countries.

Says Church Bells : "A bright contrast to the obstinacy and parsimony which have prevented the progress of the Free Library movement is, however, furnished at Watford, in Hertfordshire, where a local school of music has been established in accordance with the spirit, if not absolutely within the terms of the letter, of the Act. Some years ago a suggestion was made that each parish might place an organ in its vestry hall, if the consent of the ratepayers could be obtained ; but the Athenæum, if we recollect aright, argued that it would scarcely be legal to take such a course. If, however, the inhabitants of a parish or a borough can rate themselves for the establishment of a school of music, there would seem to be no valid reason why they should not resolve to purchase a musical instrument, which would contribute to the public pleasure and improvement,"

JOHN SMITH'S DOCTORATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" (Macmillan & Co.) under the heading of SMITH, JOHN, it is stated that "about 1826 he assumed the title of Doctor, but it is doubtful if the degree was ever conferred on him, no record of it existing."

No such record does exist ; but a further search in the minute-books of Trinity College, Dublin, has discovered a resolution of the Board, dated July 7, 1827, agreeing to give the degree of Doctor of Music to Mr. Smith. No other entry on the subject can be found ; but as a resolution similar to that referred to appears to have been the usual way of conferring the degree of Mus.Doc. in Dublin at that time, there seems to be no doubt that Mr. Smith was virtually entitled so to style himself.

As Editor of the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," I regret that any doubt should have been cast on the validity of Mr. Smith's title. Yours truly,

GEORGE GROVE.

Lower Sydenham, Oct. 26, 1883.

HARMONIUMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Not only as an advertiser and reader of your journal, but also as a player and admirer of that somewhat misunderstood, and consequently much maligned instrument, the Harmonium, will you allow me to say that I think the article in the above paper (Sept. 29th), signed "A.M.," on "Nose Music in Church," insulting to English makers ; incorrect—and, to my mind, written in bad taste. The writer refers to "this most offensive wind instrument" with a "nasal tone," and then proceeds to say, "fine harmoniums, of sonorous quality, may be purchased in Paris," etc., etc.

Now, any one understanding the subject is perfectly aware that the French instruments of this class are the most "nasal"-toned of any in the world. He then speaks of "this disagreeable family of pseudo-sirens," and says, "all these peculiar wind instruments, including the seraphine" (completely out of date and forgotten), "and the Apollonicon" (which really was a barrel and finger organ, containing 1,900 pipes, and 45 stops, and was built in 1812), "and, in fact, all machines where the sound is derived from the action of the wind on metallic tongues or plates" (why not have included the American organ ?) "make me feel, like Mozart, at the sound of the trumpet when blown a few commas on 'the wrong side of the post.'"

Of course it is to be regretted that the author of "Nose Music in Church" should be of such exceeding nervous temperament, and suffer from defective memory ; but I would suggest that before he writes concerning free-reed instruments again, he should make inquiry into the facts and relative characteristics of the various "species." Yours faithfully,

Hampstead Road. E. S.

P.S.—The late Scotson Clark, who did know something of harmoniums, says, "No organist should be without one."

[A. M. has a personal objection to the Harmonium. E. S. has a direct interest in its artistic development and popularity. Each writer is fairly entitled to his own opinion. The popularity of so useful an instrument as the Harmonium is not likely to suffer abatement. The various forms of this reed instrument, from the cheapest keyboard type in existence to the superb Mustel organ, the large amount of good tone produced from such a portable instrument, its organ-like power of sustaining sounds, and its admirable effects in good hands, will secure an unshakable position for the Harmonium.—ED. Mus. Stand.]

ORCHESTRAL TUNING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—May I be allowed, through the medium of your valuable paper, to call the attention of conductors of orchestral concerts to an evil the magnitude of which it is not easy to over-rate. I refer to the practice, very common among members of an orchestra, of tuning their instruments between the numbers of a programme. Recently I heard a fine performance in London of Weber's overture to "Oberon," the effect of which was quite spoiled by a vigorous "tuning" on the part of the whole orchestra, which began immediately after the last chord of the overture. The effect of this would have been ludicrous had it not been very distressing to the hearer. I feel sure it is only necessary to bring this evil before the notice of conductors to ensure an effort on their part to avoid it.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

F. C. O.

"THE COMING OPERA."

Judging from the signs of the times, and the indications of approaching activity of prominent impresarios, the probabilities point strongly toward the rapid growth and expansion of the English as the coming opera, especially with English-speaking people. We think this is as it should be, and is but the natural desire of the people to hear that which they can understand.

There is, of course, always a certain toady element that reaches after and apes the foreign, but the real solid and sensible element are beginning to give more decided tokens of a pronounced desire for that which most readily furthers their understanding and enjoyment of what they hear.

Foreigners are to a fault exacting and uncompromising in their adherence to their mother tongue; and it would be quite as unlikely to expect an Italian to enjoy his music in any other than his beloved language as to expect the Chinese, with their ancient and heathen traditions, to admire and enjoy the music of civilized nations.

There is undeniable evidence of the adaptation of certain languages to musical sounds, and of others as being radically unsusceptible and unfitting to musical expression. These peculiarities are quite palpable even to those of only ordinary observation.

The German is manifestly harsh and guttural, and many beautiful effects of musical expression are well-nigh ruined by this harshness, inseparable from the articulation of the language.

Also, French is totally inadequate as the vehicle of pathetic or sustained expression by reason of its constant use of the anterior organs of speech—the lips and teeth—and as a consequence there is a mincing, crisp, and forceless effect.

The English is considerably better, although partaking of some peculiarities of both, which does not make it the most euphonious language for song. But, on the contrary, all the Latin languages, as the Italian, Spanish, and even the Welsh, strange as the latter may seem, on account of their softness and predominating vowel sounds and terminations, determine such as being the best vehicles of pure musical expression.

I remember, some years since, hearing the Russian male choir on the occasion of their first visit to this country, and was pleasantly surprised to hear softness and smoothness where I had, from an observation of their language, been led to expect harshness.

In no tongue are there more mistaken notions of euphony than in the Welsh, which upon a view of the extraordinary doubling and trebling of vowels and consonants in such words as llyr, ddadblyyiad, ynghyd, gymmhuys, ngogoneddu, etc., etc., gives the impression of an impossible articulation;—and it was with me an abiding impression, until I had more direct opportunities of information and enlightenment, that the attempted articulation of such a language would involve writhings, distortions, tongue-tyings, and throat convulsions appalling to contemplate. But in no idea was I more in error, as the actual effect was soft and euphonious.

It is overwhelmingly apparent that most Asiatic languages are totally unsusceptible of adaptation to music—as, for example, the Chinese and Japanese.

We do not wish our remarks understood as being an arraignment of the English language as unfitting for musical expression, but as not being the best one for such purpose, judging from a purely musical standpoint. It is, however, the one with which we have the most to do, and the one which is bound, in the nature of the case, to supersede and crowd out all others, and consequently be the paramount reason for the growth and ultimate supremacy of the English opera.

The most renowned artists of the world are gradually becoming converted to this view; and although, while a few of the greatest will scorn the use of any other than the Italian, yet the potent majority are placing themselves in harmonious sympathy to the pronounced demands of the people, and of the best paying policy.

In our own land, Caroline Richings (since deceased), the glorious and lamented Parepa, and, latterly, Emma Abbott, have striven earnestly in the cause of their mother tongue—notably the former, who can be rightfully regarded as the pioneer in this musical path.

It is certain, however, that Mr. Carl Rosa has been, and is, doing the most powerful and educating work in this branch of the art, and is conspicuously prominent among his operatic confrères in the encouragement and engagement of English and American talent, and the production of strictly English operas by native composers. Mr. Rosa has but just brought out two new works—"Esmeralda" and "Colomba"—the products of Mr. Goring Thomas and Mr. Mackenzie, in accordance with an engagement so to do by him. Both of these works mark an era in English opera, and are the forerunners of an epoch the like of which has as yet been unrealised, and which bids fair to blossom and expand into splendid fruition.

The action of Mr. Rosa, with its attendant success, has already had its stimuating effect in America, where Mr. Silas G. Pratt, a native of Chicago, has taken the initiative, and imitated the example furnished by the husband of the adored Parepa.

It is conclusively evident to our mind that the time is rapidly approaching when we shall have a distinctive America opera, furnished and equipped by American brains and talent. This is a "consummation devoutly to be wished."—American Art Journal.

Passing Events.

Gade's "Psyche" has been performed by the Shrewsbury Harmonic Society.

On Monday last the new opera comique, "Falka," for which Mr. Farnie has written the libretto to Mons. F. Chassigne's music, was produced at the Royal Comedy Theatre.

The Goss Memorial Committee met on Tuesday last at the College of Organists. Sir A. Sullivan occupied the chair, Mr. Cummings taking his place during the closing part of the meeting.

Mr. Charles King gave a miscellaneous concert at Wisbech the other evening. Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. E. Dunkerton, Miss A. Ward (violin), Mr. King, and Mr. W. H. Jude, were the performers.

The Rev. E. W. Bullinger, D.D., has set to music Mr. Martin F. Tupper's poem on Luther, presumably with a view to use at the forthcoming London recognition of the reformer's 400th birthday anniversary on the 10th.

That excellent society the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, under the direction of Mr. E. Prout, commenced the season on Monday last with a performance of their conductor's cantata "Hereward," at the Shoreditch Town Hall.

The Kyrle Society have recently given Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at All Saints, Haggerston, and at Christ Church, Watney-street, Commercial-road. Upon both occasions Mr. M. L. Lawson was the conductor, and Mr. E. H. Turpin, the organist.

A contemporary says: A neat little operetta, "The Sergeant's Ruse," cast for four characters, two of each sex, has been written by Mr. Panting for Miss Cameron's operetta company, by whom it found intelligent interpretation at the Surrey Masonic Hall, on Tuesday evening. Miss Horton, who possesses an agreeable contralto voice, is, perhaps, the most meritorious of the quartet. The music, by Mr. T. Merton Clarke, is bright and catching.

On Tuesday evening, Oct. 30th, a concert in aid of the Church Schoolmasters and Schoolmistresses' Benevolent Institution, was given in St. Michael's Hall, Hackney. The vocalists were Mdme. Clara West, Mdme. Christine Wallace, Miss Annie Cole, Mr. Mullerhausen, Mr. Stanley Cockton, Mr. Pegler, and the St. John's College (Battersea) Glee Party. Buffo, Mr. H. P. Matthews; pianists, Miss Pharoah, and Mr. Sharp; concertina, Mr. Hobday. There was a very large and appreciative audience.

Mr. J. S. Curwen closed on Saturday last a fortnight's lecturing tour in Durham and Northumberland. Large and successful gatherings were held at Stockton, West Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Sunderland, Wallsend, Newcastle, North and South Shields, Jarrow, Bishop Auckland, Durham, and Darlington. These meetings took the form of musical demonstrations of the Tonic Sol-fa system by choirs of children specially trained, Mr. Curwen giving the necessary explanations. At Durham Mr. Curwen addressed the students of the University in one of the lecture-rooms.

Under the title of "The Musical Year" a new work is being issued from the pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, which will contain selections from his criticisms. There can be no doubt about the usefulness of such a book; for however valuable good criticisms may be in our widely-spread newspapers, they are there read in the midst of a number of varied surroundings and impressions, and there will be distinct gain in having opinions upon important artistic productions and performances placed upon permanent record in book form. It is needless to add, that Mr. Joseph Bennett is known to be a writer of such unimpeachable judgment, critical experience, verbal clearness and shrewd observation, that the work must needs be both instructive and pleasant reading.

It is reported that Franz Liszt is engaged on the composition of a new pianoforte concerto, his third work of this type.

It is stated that Senor Sarasate will go to Russia next month, with the intention of remaining there throughout the winter season. He will probably return to Paris about March, and may be shortly afterwards expected in London.

A correspondent writes of the following services of musical interest, at St. Mary-of-the-Angels, Bayswater. On Saturday the 3rd, the First Vespers of the Feast of St. Charles will be sung at 4.30. p.m. The music will consist of Mozart's setting of the Vesper Psalms in C, with the exception of the "Laudate Pueri," which will be by Capocci, the Maestro di Capella of St. John's Lateran. On Sunday the 4th, the music at the High Mass (11 a.m.), will consist of Haydn's Mass in C (No. 2), with Mozart's Offertorium, "Splendente te Deus." Mozart's Vespers will be sung again in the evening at 7 p.m.

Musicians will be glad to hear that a neat and simple little contrivance for turning over the pages of music has been invented by an Armenian mechanic, named Erghanian, and patented in several European countries. This small apparatus is worked silently by a treadle, and gently picks up the page, which it lays smoothly on the opposite one. It can be applied to any ordinary music stand, and will doubtless be of great use in orchestras, avoiding by its use, the pause and flapping of leaves, when the players have to wait and turn over the pages of their music.—Chambers's Journal.

The great success which has been achieved by the reproduction of Balfe's "Mazeppa" at Margate has awakened the attention of other choral societies to the value and interest of the work, so that there is a prospect of its becoming as popular and as well known as it deserves. It should be stated in connection with the revival that great credit is due to Mr. Frank Bodda for his exertions in the matter. In his desire to bring Balfe's music to the place it should occupy in public estimation, he has shown himself in every way a worthy partner of his talented wife, formerly Miss Louisa Pyne, who, in conjunction with the late Mr. William Harrison, played many of Balfe's operas on the stage at the Lyceum and Covent Garden Theatres.—Morning Post.

The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury have apparently discovered there is some truth in the saying that "The larger the church the less room there is for the organ." A meeting was held on Saturday last for the purpose of coming to a final decision as to the purchase or rejection of the organ offered them by Mr. Holmes. A representation of the organ had been placed on each side of the choir, and also in the north and south transepts. These were so arranged that persons could pass beneath, but they completely obstructed the view from the transepts to the nave, besides presenting an incongruous appearance, and it was thought greatly marred the architectural beauty of the building. So after a minute inspection and long consideration the Chapter declined the offer.

Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was given with orchestral accompaniments at S. Stephen's, Gloucester Road, South Kensington, on Sunday evening, the occasion being the Harvest Festival. It was also repeated on All Saints' Day. The vocal parts were taken entirely by the members of the choir, under the direction of the newly-appointed organist, Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus.Bac., Cantab.

BURIAL PLACE OF DR. MAURICE GREENE.—I have never been able to find any record of the burial place of Dr. Maurice Greene. Can any of your readers inform me where he was interred?—Q. R.

Reply.

J. I. F.—It is possible that the anthem enquired after by J. I. F., "Behold, how good and pleasant," is the unaccompanied chorus forming No. 19 of Henry Smart's cantata, "Jacob." I have heard it on one occasion in Birmingham employed as an anthem. "Jacob" is published by Cramer and Co., but I do not think this chorus is issued separately.—S. S. S.

ORGAN BUILDERS,

WYNDHAM STREET, PLYMOUTH.

London Agency: Mr. W. H. HELE, 59, Gresham St., E.C.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

THE VOICE
MUSICALLY AND MEDICALLY CONSIDERED.

BY
ARMAND SEMPLE, B.A., M.B., Cantab., M.R.C.P., Lond.,
Physician to the Royal Society of Musicians.

All uncultivated voices invariably present certain marked defects, or are unequally developed in parts. Many are deficient in compass, steadiness, power, mellowness, flexibility, and elasticity, whilst others are tremulous, throaty, nasal, harsh, veiled, or piercing. Many persons, possessed of a good ear and genuine love for music, are deterred from singing because they find that their voices appear harsh and unmusical when attempting certain notes, and, in consequence, they will make no attempt to sing, conscientiously believing that they have no voices at all; but almost every individual possesses a voice suitable for singing, although of course of variable capacity, quality, and beauty, and with care and perseverance, under the watchful eye of an experienced master, the power of producing a pleasing effect in the majority of cases is almost sure of attainment.

The commonest defects, by which the beauty of the voice may be impaired, are the following:—

The Guttural or Throaty Timbre: occasioned by the rising or swelling of the tongue at its base, the epiglottis being thus driven back upon the column of ascending air, and causing the voice to be emitted with a choked sound. To correct this fault, the plan sometimes adopted is to practise singing with the handle of an ordinary silver spoon in the mouth, which should press down the base of the tongue.

For the transformation of sounds into vowels the tongue is undoubtedly the great agent, but this change should be effected mainly by the movements of the edges of the organ; its base should always remain in repose. In the formation of all vowels the degree of separation of the jaws should be almost uniform for each.

The Nasal Timbre: probably caused by too much relaxation of the soft palate, the column of air being either reflected or immediately echoed into the nasal cavities before its exit by the mouth. This fault may be obviated by merely raising the soft palate by a deep inhalation, the mouth being at the same time well opened.

The Cavernous, Hollow or Veiled Timbre: may arise from any obstruction to the advance of the sound-waves, such as the rising of the tongue at its apex; the voice may also be rendered muffled by enlargement of the tonsils—the almond-shaped structures to be seen at the back of the throat, one on each side. This latter condition presents an additional difficulty in the formation of the head voice and the extension of the compass. This veiled character may be corrected by the firm contraction or pinching of the glottis, which is best accomplished by the enunciation of the Italian I (Anglice E).

In the act of singing, the mouth should not be too open, since if the jaws are too widely separated, the pharynx becomes tightened, losing its arched or vaulted form, and thus all the vocal vibrations are arrested. If, on the other hand, the teeth are too nearly approximated, a peculiar grating quality is communicated to the voice, which has not inaptly been compared to the sound produced when singing through a comb. If the mouth takes an oval shape, the character of the voice is rendered gloomy and dull, the vowels becoming indistinct, and the expression of the face hard and unpleasing. If the lips are projected so as to form a funnel, the sound of the voice becomes heavy.

In opening the mouth the jaw should fall by its own weight, the corners of the lips slightly receding; thus the lips are kept pressed lightly against the teeth, and the mouth assumes an agreeable form; the tongue should be without motion and loose, no effort being made to elevate it, either at its apex or base, and the throat-muscles should be relaxed.

Absolute control over the breath is most essential to singing. The head should be erect, and not thrown back, but in the position it would naturally assume when addressing an individual of the same height as the singer.

The shoulders should be thrown back firmly, but without stiffness, and the chest steadily expanded. The diaphragm—the wide muscle by which the lungs are separated from the abdomen—should be steadily lowered, and the chest slowly and regularly elevated. The air is thus retained without effort; the passage of air through the glottis should never be accompanied by any noise, since this not only produces a wheezing sound, distressing to the ear, but also renders the throat stiff and dry.

The power and elasticity of the lungs may be greatly increased by submitting them to the following exercises, as recommended by the celebrated Manuel Garcia.

1st. Gently and slowly inhale, for a few seconds, as much air as the chest will contain.

2nd. After taking a deep breath, exhale again very gently and slowly.

3rd. Fill the lungs, and keep them inflated for the longest possible time. And

4th. Exhale completely, and leave the chest empty as long as the physical powers will conveniently allow.

It must, however, be admitted that all these exercises will, at first, be very exhausting, and must be practised separately, with long intervals of rest.

The first two actions, viz.: the gentle inspiration and expiration will be effected equally by nearly closing the mouth, so as to leave only a very slight opening for the passage of air. The pupil will, by these means, acquire steadiness of voice.

The breath influences the method or character of vocal execution; having the power of rendering it either steady or vacillating, connected or unconnected, feeble or powerful, expressive or expressionless.

At a meeting of the Liverpool Committee of the Royal College of Music recently, it was announced that the amount necessary to form a Liverpool Scholarship, £3,000, had been subscribed.

Messrs. Novello and Co. have secured Sir M. Costa's version of "God Save the Queen." It is to be regretted that a more satisfactory setting could not be made. The score is of little use with a limited orchestra, and is only complete when used by a very large festival orchestra; as for instance, not only are trumpets employed, but two cornets are, in addition, absolutely indispensable. With Sir M. Costa's known love of noisy orchestration and really splendid knowledge of instrumentation, it is quite surprising that he did not produce a larger amount of richness and sonority than he has chosen to impart to his version of our National Anthem; his favourite trombone parts even would be condemned as a very poor specimen of student harmonization, whether judged in connection with the brass mass only or as essential to the complete score. Perhaps the version was written under pressure of time. However, it is well to know that now the version, poor as it is, is available for use, so that some general standard may be hoped for. The distinguished and enlightened publishers would have done better had they commissioned some English composer to have re-scored the piece; for it will be a poor compliment to English art not to ultimately adopt a version of our glorious National Anthem, which has sprung from an English heart, head, and hand.

The Dean of Wells, Dr. Plumptre, has been giving an interesting lecture in the Chapter House of Gloucester Cathedral on "Cathedral Singers in Times Past and Present;" in which, after conveying much valuable historical information, he proceeded to make several practical suggestions for the management of the musical staff of our cathedrals. Where there is a Theological College in a Cathedral city, the Dean suggests that some of the students should be drawn in on musical grounds, by what may be termed Choral Exhibitions; and he believes that, with such a system, the withdrawal of the choir at the celebration of the Holy Communion would no longer be permitted. For the chorister boys, Dr. Plumptre desiderates something more than general education and musical instruction; he asks that they shall receive adequate pastoral supervision on the part of the Chancellor or Precentor. The Dean has a genuine sympathy with the boys, and it is a welcome evidence of the new life which is welling up in our old cathedrals that one of their chief officers should write and speak in this way.—Church Bells.

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

If any of those who are in the habit of depreciating Mendelssohn were present on Saturday last, they must have felt that, so far from his music dying out, or becoming stale and unpopular, it invariably attracts a large audience. But it does more than this, for the more frequently it is heard, the more it seems to excite the musical appetite to fresh enjoyment of its many beauties and glories. The "Italian" symphony was as fresh and lovely as ever, and was played on this occasion as though every man in the orchestra knew it from beginning to end. The concerto for violin was intrusted to Mr. Carrodus. And here it is gratifying to observe that at two consecutive concerts we have had Englishmen as soloists. Mr. Carrodus played his part in a masterly manner and achieved a success; but with due deference to the opinion of some who think the finale is generally taken too fast by our great violinists—Sarasate is one who is said to transgress in this respect—I cannot but think that Mr. Carrodus would have done better to have taken it faster. The very character of the movement, with its marked "Allegro molto vivace," seems to demand an impetuosity aptly called "fiery."

As the "First Walpurgis Night" is not so frequently performed as some others of Mendelssohn's works, it may not be amiss to recall the leading subjects of the work. The night between the 30th April and the 1st May is called the "Walpurgis Night," the name being derived from Walpurga or Werburga, sister to Boniface, the great apostle of Germany. On this night popular tradition imagines a kind of witches' carnival to be held on the Harz mountain. Goethe, in his poem, set to music by Mendelssohn, probably wishes to show us how this superstition arose out of the mystic rites secretly celebrated by the Druids on that night. In the instrumental introduction we have the stormy blasts followed by the soft and genial air of spring, and then the Druid priest with his chorus appears on the scene and calls the people to sacrifice and not to fear their Christian foes, who would fain uproot every remnant of the old faith. After some dramatic choruses, the Christian guard appears, but mistaking the dark figures seen only by the lurid light of the sacrificial flame and enveloped in smoke, for demons, they turn and fly, leaving the Druids to finish their rites at their leisure.

The "First Walpurgis Nacht" was first publicly performed in England by the Philharmonic Society on the 8th July, 1844, having been privately performed on the 14th June at the house of Mr. Hullah, in the presence of several distinguished men, most of whom are now, alas! gone over to the great majority.

Careful rehearsals and untiring drilling of the chorus on the part of Mr. Eyre insured for it a commendable freedom from laches. The instrumental part was of course everything that could be desired. The solo vocalists, both in this work and in the other selections, were very successful. R. S.

Mr. Stephen Stratton (an excellent musician and a contributor to the Musical Standard), has it is said, resolved and actually begun to abolish "part repetitions" at his chamber concerts. It seems, says an influential writer, that the time is ripe for the innovation, as it now comes out that for many years musicians (including Sir Sterndale Bennett) have wished for "nothing less than the abolition of all part repetitions," though they had either not the courage or not the opportunity to bring it about.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The first concert of the 26th season was held on Monday evening before a densely packed audience. The following was the programme:—

PART 1.

Quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, for two violins, viola and violoncello ..... Beethoven.
Madame Norman Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.
Songs, "There is dew for the flow'ret," and "Absence" Cowen.
Miss Santley.
Ballade in G minor, Op. 42, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... F. Néruda.
Madame Norman-Néruda.
Barcarolle in F sharp major ..... Chopin.
Wiegenlied in C flat (for pianoforte alone) ..... Henselt.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann.

PART 2.

Nocturne, for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... Lachner.
Signor Piatti.
Song, "Oh! had I Jubal's lyre" ("Joshua") ..... Handel.
Miss Santley.
Quintet in A major, Op. 114, for pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello, and contrabass ..... Schubert.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Straus, Reynolds, and Piatti.
Accompanist .. .. .. Signor ROMILI.

Behold in this scheme, a "feast of fat things," a few of which, perhaps, might have been reserved; for the concert lasted longer than usual, and such music as the director so properly provides may not be taken in too large doses. What remains to be said of the actual performance? But little that has not been repeated again and again! The 3rd "Rasoumowsky" quartet, with its beautiful andante in A minor, and dashing fugal finale, just served to remind the world that a colossal genius flourished in Europe during the first quarter of the nineteenth century; also to attest the fact that the artists, all favourites and familiar to their admiring public, had not lost "cunning" in respect of their right (or left) hands. Mdme. Norman-Néruda's fine silvery tone might have asserted her presence, had the auditor been blindfold. Her brother's "Ballade," an agreeably wild, weird, and romantic sort of "gipsy" story, composed two years ago, displayed some of the lady's most salient qualities, only to note the exquisite trills, and the delicate pianissimo at the close.

Signor Piatti, "Richard himself," obliged the subscribers by introducing Ignaz Lachner's Nocturne in F, a dolce cantabile in 2-4 time, with a well-contrasted episode in the relative minor. The violoncello has here a fair range. The adagio is the second of three "Characteristic Pieces," and seems to deserve more favourable notice than it has received elsewhere.

Place for Herr Vladimir de Pachmann, happily engaged by Mr. Arthur Chappell for the very first soirée, and for two more (Nov. 10th and 12th). This gifted Russian gentleman has been so frequently and so lavishly eulogized in your columns and elsewhere, that a full endorsement of previously expressed opinions seems to be best becoming. The connoisseurs, between the parts, were all extolling the marvellous executancy, soft liquid touch, and delicate gradations of tone. M. de Pachmann chose two consecutive pieces in (practically), the same key, F sharp major and G flat; the effect, it must be admitted, was slightly monotonous. Chopin, by the way, has chosen G flat for a delightful "Etude" No. 5, the motif whereof strongly suggests the vivace (finale) of Beethoven's Sonatina in G, Op. 79. Henselt's "Cradle Song" reminds the musician of Schumann's "Schlummerlied"; also, as some say, of Chopin's "Berceuse": no matter, for the piece is prettiness itself, and should be heard before bed-time, as a preventive of prevalent insomnia. The melody, in 6-8 time, is formed of holding notes (dotted crotchets), with a peculiar syncopated accompaniment of quavers, on a tonic pedal bass. Henselt, (a Russian), visited England in 1867, but declined to play in public. Of course M. de Pachmann was bissé, when he once more sat down to the grand Broadwood and played an "extra," a quick movement in C minor, the authorship whereof was not recognised by any of the pundits, although one a very learned man, was inclined to give the credit to Henselt. M. de Pachmann is to play Schubert's Rondo in A flat, Op. 90 (first time), and Mozart's "Fantasia" in C minor, on Monday next.

Miss Santley was much applauded and recalled. Schubert's pianoforte quintet, first introduced at the "Popular" by MM. Hallé and Joachim, so far back as January 1867, has only been repeated four times (including last Monday). The work bears date A.D. 1819, anno.

ætatis 22. The "Trout" theme of the Variations in D stamps the composition. Herr de Pachmann led the quintet with sympathetic grace, expression, and sensibility, and Mr. Reynolds played the double bass effectively. The new conductor, Signor Romili, is likely to satisfy his audiences.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Programme of the second concert, held Saturday, 3rd inst.:—

Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner.
Introduction and Closing Scene, "Tristan und Isolde"	,,
Preislied, "Die Meistersinger"	,,
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2	Liszt.
Symphony, No. 5, in D minor	Beethoven.

There is a most delightful sense of rest in one's enjoyment of these familiar programmes, familiar to the audience through many hearings, and familiar to the orchestra through careful study with a conductor who has mastered the scores, not only in their musical, but also in their poetical aspect. The hearer forgets even the possibility, which usually haunts him, of a blurred impression arising from a particular phrase not coming out with due prominence; of an effect being spoilt through the failure of horns or trumpets; of a want of steadiness troubling his serenity; and ceasing to look for any of these casualties, he abandons himself unreservedly to his delight in the performance. Certainly it is still possible for a string to break at an unlucky moment (proof thereof was given at this concert), but all avoidable imperfections seems to be successfully excluded. To say that a particular part of the programme was given to greater perfection than the rest, can, when all is perfect, simply be to affirm that our individual mind happened to be more in accordance with the spirit of one piece or another at the moment of performance, and therefore was much more alive to its beauties as they are set forth.

A truly representative audience (from Royalty and distinguished artists downward), completely filled the hall, at both first and second concert. The third and last is announced to take place to-night.

Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody, given at one of the summer concerts and then criticised, is the only unfamiliar piece presented, and therefore the only one needing comment, for Mr. Lloyd's careful rendering of the "Prize Song" is not unknown among us, nor is it ever unappreciated.

Those who heard the Rhapsody last season could scarcely fail to have been impressed with the vastly more finished and appreciative reading of last Saturday. Whether we do or do not admire the work, we must all feel that everything was done for it that could be done in the performance. And it requires no small amount of tact to play a Liszt rhapsody aright—to give it life, energy, unlimited spontaneousness, and yet to steer clear of any approach to grotesqueness.

Liszt, the inventor of the Rhapsody, remains its only successful author; others have succeeded in what they have called rhapsodies, but which might as well have been called caprices or fantasias. No other writer has caught the improvisation-like character, the quaint entry of subject after subject, the designed failure of ideas when a subject has been as it were, "talked out" among the instruments, till just at the moment when the pause in the conversation is becoming embarrassing, some one hits on a happy idea; others discourse on it till it soon engages the attention of the entire orchestra; other thoughts arise, or perhaps an old idea comes back with a new light on it, there seems to be absolutely no forethought, and yet who can say with how vast an amount of thought this apparent freedom from law and design has been attained? Liszt's Rhapsodies will make many enemies, but they will not fail to find many friends.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

Another Reporter writes:—

The second concert on Nov. 3rd surpassed the first, if that be possible. I make it a religious rule never to miss the magnificent overture to "Tannhäuser," a composition at once unique in respect of the music, and a sublime symbol, in celestial tone-poetry, of the still enduring contest between the powers of good and evil, light and darkness. The persistent Chorus of Pilgrims, so pertinaciously self-asserting against the bright, but heathenish and voluptuous "Song" of the as yet unconverted hero, always suggests to my mind the "war in heaven" and the final conquest of the TRUTH. The performance was perfect, but the enjoyment much alloyed by late comers, who stumbled over your feet, and had the impudence to greet their gossiping friends aloud en passant! Why does not Herr Franke bar the doors of the hall for the time being, like M. Dannreuther? The other Wagnerian numbers are both golden specimens. I admire the excerpt from "Tristan und Isolde" again and again; and on this occasion, the rapture of delight was renewed. The "Death Song," however, certainly loses some of its effect off the stage, where the "situation" (teste the Drury Lane season of 1882), equals any cognate crisis in the records of the lyrical theatre. What do pundits say to the changes of tonality (in the "Death Song"), from four flats to five sharps, and the harmonic progressions in the 2nd and 4th bars of the "Sehr Massig" (page 49 of Programme Book), where (transient) perfect fifths, in similar motion, occur on the accents of the measure? Beethoven, who "asked after" the prohibitors of these fifths, has not scrupled to use them twice, in the slow moment of the Sonata Appassionata, although, theoretically, the first fifth is made a doubly "augmented" fourth by the B double flat in the bass. When Smellfungus sneers at Wagner for lacking vocal melody, let us point to the delicious "Prize Song," in C, from "Die Meistersinger," beautifully rendered by Mr. E. Lloyd. I have already noted the "Prayer" of Elizabeth, and Wolfram's "Abendstern" song in "Tannhäuser," and the "Spinning Chorus" from "Der Fliegende Holländer" as models. Liszt's "Rhapsody" in D delights the ear, my ear at least, by repetition: the music is so characteristic and varied. All the same, it must be allowed that this Gipsy stuff—call it "Lassans," "Frischkos"—or what not, is pitched in a very low key. Mr. Oluf Svendsen here played his flute obbligato most effectively. Beethoven's 5th Symphony had been heard several times before under Herr Richter's bâton. A significant testimony to the great Viennese conductor may be reported. All the connoisseurs, and the mass of the audience, remained in the hall to the very last. Such execution, for homogeneity, baffles mere pen-and-ink sketching. Herr Richter and his band were to appear at Manchester on Wednesday night.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

A fine performance of "La Damnation de Faust" took place on Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Barnby, conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. The Hall was crowded to the doors, and the fine work of Hector Berlioz seemed to be fully appreciated—witness the (customary) encores of the March in A; the Sylphs' Dance in D; and the Serenade of Mephistopheles in B major. Mdme. Albani, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Pyatt, and Mr. Santley were the solo "principals." The performance lasted three hours, and many of the audience left long before the end.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The entertainment on Saturday last was one of chamber music, and included a Trio by Herr Bonawitz for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, played by himself, Mdlle. C. Brousil, and Mr. H. Trust; Mozart's Trio in B flat, and the finale from one of Haydn's trios, were also included in the programme. Herr Bonawitz played admirably, one of his solos, the Liszt version of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," and was encored. He also gave other solos by Frohberger, Mendelssohn, and Chopin. Mdlle. Brousil played effective violin solos. Miss Ada South sang nervously, but was encored in one song. To-night Stainer's "Mary Magdalen" will be repeated. Now the institution boasts of a fine choir as well as of the possession of a splendid organ, it might be well worth while to increase the number of choral concerts given under Mr. McNaught's able direction. However, the Committee have proved themselves so able to judiciously foster the artistic growth in their hands, that they may be left safely to do or not to do as they see best.

Sub rosa, it is said that the welcome announcement of the publication of Mr. Joseph Bennett's "The Musical Year," is in a great measure due to the thoughtful suggestion of a distinguished non-professional lover and patron of the art, who has himself done the cause of music good service during the past year.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

The excellent performances of this society have recommenced under the conductorship of Dr. Bridge, whose knowledge, skill, and tact are everything that could be desired for the due rendering of the choice works given.

The programme on October 3rd, ran thus :—

Madrigal,	"Now tune the viol"	Camio.
,,	"Ah, me! where is my true love"	Anerio.
,,	"Lady unkind"	Ferretti.
,,	"Your shining eyes"	Bateson.
Anthem,	"Hear my prayer"	Haydn.
Madrigal,	"Soon the silver moonbeams"	Gastoldi.
,,	"Ah, me! she frowns"	Pilkington.
,,	"Now let us make"	Weelkes.

Motet,	"Jehovah reigns"	Palestrina.
Madrigal,	"Hard by a fountain"	Waelrent.
,,	"Adieu, my joy"	Virchi.
,,	"April is in my mistress' face"	Morley.
,,	"Ye pearls of snowy whiteness"	Croce.
,,	"Flora gave me fairest flowers"	Wilby.
,,	"Spring returns"	Marenzio.
Ballet,	"What saith my dainty darling"	Morley.

MANCHESTER.

By the 22nd of October all our musical societies and agencies are in full swing, and the present season forms no exception to the rule.

Glancing at last Saturday's newspapers I find no less than six concerts announced to be given in the space of as many days, and this may be taken as a fair sample of the state of musical activity in Manchester during the winter.

Mr. Hallé has already given two concerts, the "Redemption" (with Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as principals), having been performed last Thursday; and Mr. De Jong a couple. It is to be hoped that Mr. Hallé will not disappoint those of his subscribers who justly expect that this season shall be more fruitful in the production of novelties than the last few years have been. Mackenzie's "Jason" is, I believe, to be given.

The "Royal" English Opera Company have been performing at the Prince's Theatre for the last week. With Mesdames Gaylard, Cole, and Franklein, and Messrs. Packard, Sauvage, and Lyall in the troupe, one looked for good things, but it takes more than a few competent singers to constitute a good opera company. The chorus was not fair to look upon nor to hear, and the band was unsatisfactory, a result partly attributable to the conductor. The repertoire included "Mignon" (in Italian), and the "Piper of Hamelin." Madme. Gaylard was as successful as ever in her charming impersonation of the heroine in Thomas's opera, whilst Mr. Sauvage and Mr. Lyall were both conspicuously excellent in the "Piper."

That ancient institution the "Gentleman's Concerts," which has now been in existence for a century and more, is threatened with extinction. Under the present management the concern has languished for some years past, and the directors now propose to wind it up. Such a result would be a lasting disgrace to Manchester, and a committee of the subscribers are endeavouring to prevent such an undesirable consummation, and give the concerts a new lease of life. I have reason to hope that their efforts will be successful. Under proper management these entertainments occupy a most useful place, but as at present conducted they can only end in failure.

I am glad to hear that M. Guilmant is to pay us a visit next month.

It is not good that the Town Hall organ should be under the exclusive control of one individual, however eminent he may be, and the Corporation may be reminded that it is two years since the keys of their fine instrument were touched by a stranger's hand.

GLASGOW.

The prospectus of the Choral Union Concerts just issued is of great uniform excellence, both as regards the vocalists and instrumental performers and the works selected. There will be twelve concerts this season, eight being orchestral and four choral. Herr August Manns, of the Crystal Palace, will again conduct, and, with an augmented orchestra should once more give delight to Glasgow music-lovers. The vocalists are as follows: Miss Mary Davies, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mdlle. Warnots, Miss C. Samuell, Miss Robertson, Miss H. Coward, Miss Thudichum, Miss C. Elliot, Miss H. D'Alton, Madame Patey, Miss M. McKenzie, Miss G. Damian; Messrs. M'Guckin, C. Chilley, E. Lloyd, J. Maas, Santley, Bridson, and King. Solo violinists: Herr H. Heermann and Signor Papini. Solo violoncellist: Signor Piatti. Solo pianists: M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Mdlle. Janotha, Madame Montigny-Rémaury. Organist: Dr. A. L. Peace. Chorus-master: Mr. Allan Macbeth. The choral works are Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," Handel's "Acis and Galatea," Handel's "Messiah," Gounod's "Redemption," Berlioz's "Messe des Morts"; and on an orchestral night F. David's symphonic ode, "The Desert." The scheme of orchestral works includes symphonies by Beethoven ("Eroica" and "Pastoral"), Bennett, Mendelssohn ("Italian"), Mozart ("Jupiter"), Schubert, and Schumann. Concertos by Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn and Piatti. Overtures by Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Cherubini, Macfarren ("King David"), Rossini, Wagner and Weber. Other orchestral works by Cowen, Delibes, Gluck, Haydn, Liszt, Macbeth, Mackenzie, Raff, Stanford, Sullivan and Wagner. There is nothing absolutely new in the scheme, unless so far as Glasgow is concerned, all of the principal works having been produced elsewhere. The first concert takes place on December 4th, and the last February 5th, 1884.

The following Musical Associations, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Hoeck, will this season produce the undermentioned works—Pollokshield's Musical Association: Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron." Hillhead Musical Association: Schumann's "Song for the New Year," and Miscellaneous. Bothwell Musical Association; "The Erl-King's Daughter" (Gade, etc.) Queen's Park U. P. Church Choir: Gade's "Christmas Eve," and Gounod's Third "Messe Solonnelle." The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society: Symphony No. 2 in A, (Haydn); and Cherubini's "Lodoiska" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overtures, etc.

Madame Helen Hopskirk gave a farewell concert in St. Andrew's Hall, on November 2, previous to her departure to America. The programme consisted of selections from Mendelssohn, Bach, Brahms, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Gluck, Nicodé, Chopin, Field, and Rubinstein, played from memory.

J. B.

ST. GEORGE'S GLEE UNION.—The 178th monthly concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms on the 2nd inst. The chief feature of the programme was "John Gilpin," a comic cantata by George Fox. The soloists were Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Mary Belval, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The first part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, songs being contributed by the artists before mentioned, and Mr. Hirwen Jones. The part. singing was good, and included "Hark! the lark" (Dr. Cooke), "Damon and Phyllis" (Theodore Distin), and a chorus "The Charge of the Light Brigade" (Hecht). The accompaniments were played by Mr. Kinkee and Mr. F. R. Kinkee, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

MILE END.—On Saturday evening, Nov. 3rd, a performance of Handel's "Messiah," was given in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End. The principal vocalists were Madme. Clara West, Mrs. Day Winter, Mr. H. D. Field, and Mr. C. T. Marriner, most of whom acquitted themselves admirably, Madme. West especially charming the audience in "Rejoice greatly," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and Mr. Marriner in "The trumpet shall sound," which had to be repeated. The band and chorus were fairly good. Conductor, Mr. G. Day Winter; organist, Mr. Bellman. There was a very large attendance on the occasion.

CLAREMONT LECTURE HALL.—A concert, forming the first of a series of winter entertainments, was given in Claremont Lecture Hall, Pentonville Road, on Monday, the 5th inst., at eight o'clock. Solos were ably rendered by Misses Ethel Harwood, George, and Goudge; Messrs. W. H. Glanvill, W. H. Mason, and Jas. Strugnell. Duets were also given by the Misses Pettit and Latham, and by Miss Harwood and Mr. Mason. Mr. W. L. Frost contributed to the success of the evening by giving a selection of Scotch airs, arranged by himself, on the piano and harmonium, and he and Mr. Percy Collins accompanied throughout. Next entertainment takes place on the 3rd prox., when readings and recitations will be given by Messrs. Fred. W. Broughton and T. Grahame Plumber; songs by Miss Minnie Gwynne and Mr. Brandon; and Messrs. W. L. Frost and Percy Collins at the piano and organ.

NEW BARNET.—A concert was lately given at the Parochial school rooms, New Barnet, in aid of the funds for the Church of England Temperance Society. The credit of this successful concert, for such it was, rests with Mr. W. D. Herbert together with Mr. G. D. Taylor, whose efforts were rewarded by a crowded room and appreciative audience. The performers included Mrs. Langley and Miss Alice Taylor, accompanists; Madme. Ashton, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Chaplain Henry, whose names alone are sufficient guarantee for the quality of the vocal music. Miss Cartwright, a young amateur of promising talent, also sang. Miss Hilda French, an amateur pianist of much talent, residing at New Barnet, played with success, grand fantasia "La Valse de Faust" (Liszt) and a tarantelle. Mrs. W. D. Herbert being unable to sing through illness, Mr. Henry kindly volunteered "The Old Brigade" in her stead. Some excellent duets and trios, in which Mr. G. D. Taylor joined, contributed to the successful issue of this concert.

ST. MARY OF THE ANGELS, W.—On Nov. 3rd, Mozart's Vespers in C were sung (probably for the first time in England) at this church, it being the Eve of the Feast of St. Charles. Mozart's ever fresh and beautiful music was capitally rendered by the choir of the church. A word of special mention is due to the exquisite singing of Master Charles Crowther in the various soprano solos throughout the Psalms, notably in the fifth—

Digitized by Google

"Laudate Dominum," which was beautifully rendered. Mr. John Probert (tenor) sang the melodious, but trying "Laudate pueri" of Capocci (with treble and alto chorus), with great spirit, his beautiful, sympathic voice showing to much advantage. Master C. Burton and Mr. T. Fraser took the incidental alto and bass solos. On Sunday morning Haydn's fine mass in C, No. 2, was splendidly sung by the choir, the above-named singer taking the solos. Mr. Fraser rendered the lovely "Qui tollis" one of the finest movements of the mass, in a feeling and artistic manner. Mozart's "Splendente te Deus" was sung at the Offertory. Next Sunday the choir will sing Cherubini's Coronation Mass in A, and a special sermon will be preached in aid of the choir by the Rev. R. B. Sankey, Mus.Bac., Oxon.

Organ News.

LIVERPOOL.

An organ recital was given in St. George's Hall, by Mr. W. T. Best, on Saturday, October 6th. The following was the programme :—

MANCHESTER.

Two recitals were given by Mr. J. Kendrick Pyne, organist, Manchester Town Hall, and Mr. Wm. Mullineux, organist, Bolton, on the 24th and 25th inst., at the Central Organ Works of Messrs. Richardson and Sons, upon the large organ for St. James Church, Westhoughton.

PRESTON.

An organ recital was given on Wednesday evening, October 31st, by Mr. James Tomlinson, organist to the Corporation, on a new organ, at Messrs. Ainscough and Co.'s Organ Works, Derby Street. The organ has two manuals, and is enclosed in a case of elegant design. The instrument is, for its size, very effective.

On Saturday evening, November 3rd, Mr. James Tomlinson, organist to the Corporation, gave his usual weekly recital in the New Public Hall. The programme was as follows :—

Andante	Wesley.
Overture to "Jessonda"	Spohr.
Bell Rondo	Morandi.
Marche Funebre et Chant Seraphique	Guilmant.
"The British Patrol" (Descriptive Allegro)	Asch.
Airs from "Les Hugenots"	Meyerbeer.

The "Marche Funebre" was rendered with great feeling, and was received with loud applause ; as was also the "Bell Rondo." The piece of the evening was, however "The British Patrol," for the spirited rendering of which Mr. Tomlinson secured a well merited encore. The recital concluded with some of the most pleasing airs from the popular opera, "Les Hugenots." There was a moderate attendance.

WOOLWICH.

The new organ at St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church was opened by Mr. E. H. Turpin on Nov. 5th. The instrument is very effective and of good tone. The maker is Mr. W. E. Richardson, of Camberwell and Manchester. The organ has two manuals and pedal. During the Recital, the choir sang three movements from Mozart's 12th Mass.

PRESENTATION TO MISS BERRIE STEPHENS

This young and much esteemed artist was the recipient of a truly munificent gift on Saturday, Nov. 3rd, when her friends and pupils presented her with an excellent and highly-finished chamber organ, handsomely decorated in black and gold. The presentation took place at the young lady's residence and organ studio, Downham Road, Islington. The instrument, built by Mr. E. Ingram, and very delicately voiced, has two manuals and pedal. The Rev. J. W. Horne, Vicar of St. James the Apostle, Islington, at which church Miss Stephens is organist, made the presentation, and Mr. E. H. Turpin gave a short Recital to display the powers of the instrument. To Mr. Harry Sullivan the greatest credit is fairly due for having brought this gratifying and well-deserved presentation to so successful an issue. Miss Berrie Stephens will now be able to receive organ pupils with exceptional advantages at her own home.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. Eyre's programmes, on Saturday, November 3rd, included the following :—

"Hero's March"	Mendelssohn.
Fantasia in C	Tours.
Andante in G	Macfarren.
Fugue in D minor	Bach.
Motet, "Hear my prayer"	Mendelssohn.
Entr'acte in B flat, "Rosamunde"	Schubert.
Grand Offertoire in G	Wely.
Jubilant March	Stainer.
Larghetto from the Clarinet Concerto	Mozart.
Barcarolle, in G	Spohr.
Finale from a Suite for Orchestra	Schumann.

MAIDSTONE.

An organ recital was given at the Parish Church, by the organist, Mr. S. Bath. Subjoined is the programme:—

Toccata in F	Bach.
Barcarolle	Bennett.
Organ Sonata, No. 6	Mendelssohn.
Quasi Pastorale } Andante in G }	Smart.
Offertoire in D	Batiste.

BRISTOL.

An organ recital was given in the Colston Hall, on Saturday, October 27th, by Mr. George Riseley. The following was the programme :—

Offertoire in D major	Batiste.
Romanza	Mendelssohn.
Organ Concerto	Handel.
Allegro—Andante maestoso—Adagio—Allegro.
Barcarolle	Bennett.
Prelude and Fugue in D major	Bach.
"Cradle Song"	Lange.
Overture, "Zanetta"	Auber.

And on Thursday, November 1st :—

Overure, "Samson"	Handel.
Largo in D major	Beethoven.
Organ Sonata, No. 4 in B flat	Mendelssohn.
Allegro—Andante—Allegretto—Allegro.
Largo	Handel.
Fantasia et Fuga in G minor	Bach.
Minuet and Trio	Bennett.
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.

And on Saturday, November 3rd :—

March in E flat	Kefterer.
Andantino and Allegretto, "Momens Musicaux"	Schubert.
Prelude and Fugue in A minor	Bach.
"Ave Maria"	Cherubini.
Organ Sonata, No. 5, in D major	Mendelssohn.
Andante—Andante con moto—Allegro.
"O ruddier than the cherry" } "But the waters" }	Handel.
Gavotte, "Mignon"	Thomas.
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold.

OLDHAM.

On Wednesday evening, October 31st, Mr. W. A. Wrigley, organist of Holy Innocents, Fallowfield, Manchester, gave a recital on the organ in the Fine Art Exhibition. The programme included :—

Offertoire in D minor	Batiste.
Air varied, in B flat	Haydn.
"Cornelius" March	Mendelssohn.

BRIGHTON.

The Corporation organ recitals were given in the Dome, Royal Pavilion, by Mr. A. King, Mus.Bac., on Saturday, November 3rd. The programme included :—

Andante in G	Smart.
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Andante in C, from 3rd Symphony	Haydn.
Fantasia in E flat	Saint-Saens.
Con moto—Allegro di molto.
Overture in F	Morandi.

The new organ in the Chapel Royal, was opened on All Saints' Day, November 1st. Mr. F. Butler, A.C.O. and organist, gave admirably rendered organ recitals. The programmes included :—

Offertoire in C	Wely.
Andante con moto	Calkin.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor	Bach.
Cantilene Pastorale	Guilmant.
Andante in F	Smart.
"Festal March"	Calkin.
"Occasional Overture"	Handel.
"Weihnachtspastorale"	Merkel.
"Song without words"	Calkin.
Fugue in G minor	Bach.
Offertoire in G	Batiste.
Offertoire in D minor	"
Priere	Hauser.
Minuet and Trio	Bennett.

The organ was built from a specification by Mr. J. Baptiste Calkin, F.C.O., by Messrs. Henry Willis and Son. It consists of three complete manuals, from CC to G, 56 notes; and two octaves and a half of concave and radiating pedals, from CCC to F, 30 notes, and has some thirty-two stops.

UPTON CHAPEL, LAMBETH.

In connection with the opening of the new organ, which has been erected in this Church by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, a recital was given on Wednesday, October 31st, by Mr. E. H. Turpin, before an audience which filled the spacious and handsome edifice to overflowing. The programme contained several items of interest, among them being a contribution in MS. from Mr. E. J. Hopkins, "Adagio in D, for organ," which was received with delight, as it deserved to be. The vocalists who assisted were, Miss Annie Williams, Miss Matilda Roby, R.A.M., Mr. Chaplin Henry, and Mr. John Cornwall, the accompanist being Mr. W. Taylor. Mr. Chaplin Henry especially distinguished himself by his splendid rendering of Gounod's "Nazareth." The following was the programme of organ pieces—

Organ Sonata, No. 5	Mendelssohn.
Andante Op. 26	Beethoven.
Fugue in G major	Bach.
Air, with variations	Haydn.
Allegro Vivace	Morandi.
Adagio in D (MS.)	Hopkins.
Variations on a Ground Bass (5th Concerto, and Set)	Handel.
Andante, Symphony No. 6	Mozart.
Overture, "Harmonie Musik"	Mendelssohn.

The organ is a very effective and fine toned one, with concave pedals, and all the latest improvements; it is enclosed in a very massive and highly ornamental case, and altogether has a very imposing appearance. The instrument certainly reflects great credit upon the builders, being undoubtedly one of their happiest efforts. The organist, who has just been appointed, is Mr. Henry Ford Benson, of Cambridge University, and late organist of Shoreditch Tabernacle, London. The following is the Specification :—

Fantasia, on Theme by Weber	E. H. Turpin.
Overture, "Guglielmo Tell"	Rossini.

There is a growing use of the pianoforte with organ in a goodly number of American churches; the two instruments being thought of good effect in the presentation of sacred works originally scored for an orchestra.

ST. MARY, BROOKFIELD, HIGHGATE.

The organ commenced at this church by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, in 1880, has been recently completed and was opened on Thursday, Nov. 1st, and the following Sunday. The music on All Saints' Day was excellently rendered. The organist Mr. G. E. Blunden is evidently not only a skilled player, but a painstaking choirmaster. Smart's Service in B flat and Wesley's anthem, "The Wilderness," were the chief features of the service. Mr. Blundell, whose decided talents and attainments as an organist are already recognised, gave two short recitals upon the two opening days. The first programme included Guilmant's D minor Sonata and Bach's A minor Prelude and Fugue, and the second list contained Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture by desire, and pieces by Guilmant and Salomé, etc. The congregation are to be congratulated upon the possession of a fine organ, and upon the efficient musical services it is their gain to listen to. The following is the specification :—

GREAT ORGAN. CC TO G.

1. Double Diapason ...	16 ft.	6. Harmonic Flute ...	4 ft.
2. Open Diapason ...	8 „	7. Mixture (2 ranks)

A FORM QUESTION.

THE question raised by that astute and courageous thinker Mr. F. PRAEGER regarding the abolition of repeats in classical musical forms is one concerning the progress of the art in a not unimportant direction. It is clear that either the active growth of the intelligence of listeners, or their feverish reluctance to listen with old-fashioned patience, will in future somewhat change the position of composer in the matter of setting forth his ideas. The signs in this direction have before now been pointed out; as in the case of curtailments of the older song forms and in the habitual omission of the repeats marked by the masters of the symphonic school extending from HAYDN to SCHUMANN. Of course there was something to be said in favour of the retention of repeats and repetitions, as better fixing composers ideas upon the minds of listeners, and in the case of the repeat of the first part of the structure, as helping to balance the length of different relative portions of a musical structure. Note the case of the Allegro form, when the second portion is prolonged by the intersected development section; and from the "Figaro" overture by MOZART onwards, the general custom in that preludial form of omitting the development has also resulted in the banishment of the never common repeat and a condensation of the form with advantage. However, it is important to bear in mind that the analogy offered by Mr. PRAEGER between the supposed repetition of portions of a poem and repetitions of musical themes is not quite an exact one. The composer's themes are his characters rather than his disconnected detailed thoughts; and the poet does draw together, for their final dramatic reward, his chief characters, just as the musician resumes his leading themes. These processes are indeed identical. The processes of presentation, development, and recapitulation, have been previously shown to be identical in the arts appealing to the mind through the ear, as poetry, music, literature, and oratory, by slow degrees. For all these arts demand the creation of an artificial memory in order to convey to a listener or reader a full conception of their complete forms and purposes. Again, it must be borne in mind, that music, by the very nature of its fleeting sounds, which receive no strengthening from external impressions as does the constantly used verbal language, is the one art which must ever be the most difficult of mental realisation. As the architect would not dream of a structure which in length, breadth, or height, would pass beyond the scope of the eye, so the musician is in a corresponding way limited in his tone-structures to the power and scope of the sense of hearing, which again in music has less of the function of logical continuity than it possesses in dealing with expositions made in the familiar verbal language. This latter will call for further present attention.

A FEW WORDS TO "THE BRITISH PUBLIC."

IT IS the business of this and other periodicals to deal exclusively with artists and executants, to criticise their performances, to report their successes or shortcomings, to be, in short, a "medium"—not spiritual but spirituel—between the platform and the public. To-day, the pen shall be dipped in lemon juice for the benefit of the so-called "British Public," as Sir WALTER SCOTT sings, "a many-headed, "monster thing," it might be added without a fair allowance of brains within the hard numbskull. JOHN BULL has his merits, but he requires an occasional rap over the knuckles for his egotism, self-conceit, and ignorance of any other country beyond the boundaries of England; for "the travelling fools" of COWPER learn no more than the Bourbons of old from their journeys to Rome, or visits to the now fashionable "Dolomite" formation on the farther side of the Alps.

JOHN BULL, still more Mistress Bull, his too substantial and saucy wife, must be told in the "good "set terms" of melancholy JACQUES, to mend their manners in public. What they do at home, whether they gossip over poisonous and nerve-shaking make-believe "Souchong," or play the fool at croquet or lawn-tennis, matters little to the outsider of the press. But the journalist must not only wear his knout, like Mr. POTTS at the "fancy dress" déjeuner of Mrs. LEO HUNTER, but use it, without sparing, in case of need. No mystery lurks under these prefatory remarks. There is no "adder to crawl into daylight"—to quote CLAVERHOUSE'S sarcastic sneer at the fanatical Scottish Covenanters, but a valiant lion in the path, ready to roar and to devour! One misbehaviour of the "genteel" British mob—sufficient for the day be its evil—is the notorious noise and garrulity complained of in concert-rooms, at the Opera, and in public places generally. The nuisance, if slightly abated by authority, exists still, and must be put down by the ghost of poor Sir PETER LAURIE, if nobody else will interfere. The suicides, whom our old friend the Alderman and Caledonian saddler wanted to "put "down," tried at least to make away with themselves, and rid the world of their presence. The talkers and tattlers of the company thrust an unwelcome presence upon their intellectual superiors, and if rebuked, often shew their "cheek" without humbly "turning it to "the smiter," as the gospel enjoins.

The Directors of the Crystal Palace have done their best to prevent the annoyance, and they deserve many thanks. An edict is nailed to the walls of the concert-room at Sydenham to prohibit the entrance of any visitor during the performance of a piece, but the edict is not always respected. Late comers open the door, and what is worse, stand in front of the gallery so as to obstruct the view of critics and others not critics, but with equal right to see and be seen. The talkers, it must be allowed, have been less annoying of late, but it should be explained that, hitherto (this season), the gallery has not been overcrowded. The tardy arrivals take precious good care to prove that they wear boots and shoes. Poor Jumbo of the "Zoo," could not stamp, or as servant girls say emphatically, "stomp," with heavier tread.

At the "Popular" concerts, at the "RICHTER" réunions, and the Philharmonic, the British Public are only partially "put down." Mr. CHARLES HALLE requests his (special) audiences to be in their seats ten minutes before the time, but a schoolboy would irreverently "take a sight" at this modest desire, if only to signify the familiar phrase, "don't you wish," &c., &c. True that at these classical concerts, very late comers are usually made to stand in the corner, and are not guided to their seats until the piece or movement closes; but these people, alas, meanwhile stand in your light, and "their fathers," again to quote school slang, "were not glaziers!" But during the first quarter-of-an-hour, woe to the wights that sit in the gangways or in the recesses. A process of clothes-brushing and boot-cleaning, rough and ready, but not very "nice," begins at the expense of the punctual, and endeth not soon! The men give you plenty of kicks and no half-crowns; the women—no ladies—try to infect you with a cold by the draught from their ample dresses, some of which, with those monstrous queues or "trains," often, en révanche, get trodden upon and torn from the "gussets." You must wait for peace and quietness at least half an hour. Towards the end of the concert, the evil is exaggerated. Selfish old dowagers, anxious to gain their carriages, renew the promenade along the gangway, and do much to stifle the sweet sounds from the orchestra.

The talking may sometimes be stopped or checked by a few angry hushes. On Monday night the writer had the misfortune to sit before two women, one a silly girl, the other une femme d'un certain âge, fat, like the majority of stupid people, and of decided anti-Platonic views. The pair of parrots tried to talk aloud and then to whisper. They wanted to encore Miss SANTLEY, and said that they should buy her songs (by Mr. F. COWEN), the next day; but they had not one word for CHOPIN or M. de PACHMANN, so far as the ear attested. These women "thought aloud."

And now for the effectual remedy, or rather prevention of the nuisance complained of. Barring out in the first place, and stern demonstrations from the audience, with aid from authoritative officials in the next. Social offenders, like criminals, have no moral courage; they are easily suppressed and made to look foolish. In some places abroad, the talkers would be turned out without ceremony. Even musical auditors and professors are open to accusation; they will express their views in a shower of gushy platitudes. Why not wait until they reach home and sit down to the unavoidable infusion of sloppy sloe juice, or write to the Morning Post or the Court Journal? Every dog has his day and may bark at proper times.

A NEGLECTED CHURCH FESTIVAL.

THAT comparatively little notice is taken of "All "Saints' Day" may indeed seem strange, especially in these days when there is a yearning on all sides for greater unity in the Church. The Services of that day would lend themselves admirably for purposes of united worship. The festival was first celebrated on May 1st, but altered to Nov. 1st, by one of the Popes, as interfering on May 1st with the services of the Roman Church in honour of the VIRGIN MARY. The first of May was truly an appropriate day, when in the sweet Spring Nature herself in reviving beauty and happiness preaches the doctrine of the resurrection of the Just. It would again certainly be brighter and pleasanter on May Day than it can be on November 1st; and had the original date been adhered to it might have furnished, happily enough, the occasion of a united religious festival, say in "St. Paul's" Cathedral, by way of opening the season of religious meetings in the metropolis. However, it is needless or useless to speculate in this direction. The Church, "though quick and strong in "faith, is slow and feeble as regards any real appre-"hension of her great mission and privileges here on "earth." It is a pity some movement could not be inaugurated for a closer drawing together of the members of the various Christian bodies on "All "Saints' Day." The Services on that day in our leading Churches this year have not generally been characterised by any very distinct effort. It may be mentioned that ten years ago, Dr. JOHN NAYLOR, the new organist at York Minster, but then at Scarborough, composed for a local festival on "All "Saints' Day," an effective and scholarly cantata entitled "The Communion of Saints." This admirable work might fittingly be brought forward upon another recurrence of the feast.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The first lecture of the session was given on Tuesday last by Mr. E. Breakspeare, who considered the "Natural Laws of Expression in Musical Exposition and Practical Delivery, and their Systematical Application." Mr. Breakspeare is well-known as an expositor of what may be called the "æsthetics" of music. His lecture, as was expected, was a thoughtful and admirable consideration of a delicate and difficult subject. It will be shortly laid before the reader in full. Mr. Jas. Higgs was the chairman. He addressed the meeting at the close with some valuable words, dealing chiefly with the subject of expression as judiciously applied to contrapuntal music and to the harpsichord music of Bach and Handel, which has no original marks of expression. Mr. E. H. Turpin also spoke, touching upon the analogy between expressions natural to speech and to music. He pointed out too something of the effect of habit of thought and the desire to be mutually intelligible which regulates methods of expression. He also referred to Beethoven's use of inverted climaxes; and offered testimony to Mr. Breakspeare's valuable thoughts and words. Mr. Higgs proposed a vote of thanks to the able lecturer; and a corresponding vote of thanks to the chairman closed the meeting.

The Edinburgh Choral Union announce their Tenth Series of Concerts, to be given in the Music Hall, George-street, at 8 o'clock evening, on the following dates:—Dec. 10th, Dec. 11th, Dec. 17th, Dec. 26th, Jan. 2nd, Jan. 9th, Jan. 14th, Jan. 16th, Jan. 21st, Jan. 28th, and Feb. 4th; eleven in all, of which the subscription will only include ten; the concert on Wednesday, 2nd Jan., 1884, being given as a Special and Extra Concert. Three choral works will be performed—Haydn's Oratorio of "The Seasons" on Tuesday, 11th Dec., 1883, and Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia," with Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Jason," on Wednesday, 16th Jan., 1884. The orchestral programmes contain works both new and old, of much interest and value, which have been selected and arranged by Mr. Manns with a view to maintain, and even to extend, the reputation and influence already attached to these concerts. The orchestra has again been largely increased, and will now consist of about eighty performers. The principal artists engaged are Miss Hilda Coward; Miss Mary Davies, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Santley, Miss Thudichum, Mdlle. Elly Warnots, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. John Bridson, and Mr. Santley. Solo pianoforte, Mdme. Montigny-Rémaury, Mdlle. Janotha, M. Vladimir De Pachmann; solo violin, Herr Hugo Heermann, Signor Papini; solo violoncello, Signor Piatti. Leader of the orchestra, M. Victor Buziau. Chorus, the Edinburgh Choral Union. Organist and accompanist, Mr. Charles Bradley. The conductor for the choral concerts will be Mr. T. H. Collinson, Mus.Bac. Oxon., and for the orchestral concerts, Mr. August Manns.

Mr. Henry Fincham, of 150 Euston-road, is shortly to open an organ studio for lessons and practice, the instrument being built in accordance with the regulations of the College of Organists' Conference. The same builder has completed an organ lately for St. Mary's Church, Willesboro,' near Ashford, Kent; and has another instrument in the Ecclesiastical Exhibition at the Agricultural Hall.

Schumann's "Genoveva" has been successful at Carlsruhe.

"Le Roi de Carreau," M. Lajarte's new operetta has been successful in Paris.

"Les Curiosités de l'Opera" is a new and entertaining work by M. Th. de Lajarte, published in Paris.

Signor Palminteri's opera, "Amazilia," produced at Milan lately, was pronounced to be wanting in power and variety.

Signor G. Masutti's work, on the Italian "Maestri di Musica" of the 19th century, has had a large sale, it is said.

"Luther at Erfurt," Herr Bernard Schik's cantata, has been performed in Germany in connection with the Luther fêtes.

Herr Jules de Swert, the violoncellist, has had his opera, "Der Graf von Hammerslein" accepted in several German cities.

Three "Intermezzi" pianoforte duets by Hofman, have recently been published in Germany and find favour. The opus number is 66.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik reports that Hermann Ritter, the viola virtuoso, has been engaged for a number of concerts in Scotland.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, excellently played, proved at a recent Pasdeloup concert, a "veritable succès d'enthousiasme," says Le Menestrel.

The first performance of Herr K. Kleinmichel's opera, "Schloss de l'Orme," which took place at Hamburg on Oct. 8th, proved to be a great success.

Berlioz's "Te Deum," first heard at St. Eustache, Paris, in 1855, will be given in the Cathedral, Bordeaux, on the 5th of next month by a band and chorus of 1000.

The death on Oct. 30th of Robert Volkmann at Budapest, deprives the world of a composer of considerable power and individuality. He was born on April 6th, 1815, at Lommatsch, in Saxony. His best works are a Trio, two Quartets in G and in A minor, and two Symphonies, one in D minor being the best known of the two.

The receipts of the Opera Comique in Paris during the past years have been considerably augmented, but the returns of income at the Grand Opera show a serious falling off during the same period. This is partly to be attributed to the costly mounting of certain works, and to the often second-rate performances given of works lacking the flavour of novelty.

A grand performance of Gounod's "Redemption" took place at Vienna, on the 4th inst., for the benefit of the "Pensions Institut" of the Royal Opera House. All the principal singers, as well as the chorus and orchestra, of that celebrated theatre took part in the performance, the whole being under the conductorship of Herr J. N. Fuchs.

The Monthly Musical Record says:—That M. Hippeau, the editor of La Renaissance, has taken the initiative in the formation of an international society of composers, ten of them French and six foreign, for the purpose of giving in the spring some grand performances of instrumental and choral works at the Trocadéro. M. Ernest Reyer has accepted the presidency of this Society.

Admirers of Mozart had a great and unexpected treat a short time since in Vienna, when the orchestra under the direction of Hellmesberger performed a Mass in C minor by the immortal composer, which, previously unknown, was lately discovered by the energetic conductor among the dusty archives of the Imperial Opera-house. The work was written in 1771, that is, when the composer was fifteen, and gives promise of his future greatness. The first three parts, the "Kyrie," "Gloria," and "Credo," are, contrary to his subsequent practice, carried out at great length, while the other parts are treated much more briefly. The "Crucifixus" is especially impressive. An unusual feature of the instrumentation is the employment of four trumpets and three trombones—a little bit of youthful exuberance.—Musical World.

Recently at the Ricardi Theatre, Bergamo, a new opera, "Adello," by Luigi Logheder, and at Piacenza, a new opera, "Donna Innes," by Luigi Ricci, were heard, and it is said, received with applause.

L'Independante of Trieste (Oct. 18th), has the following reference to a new opera by Mr. George Carter, of London, entitled "Il Nerone" ("Nero":—"Il M. Giorgio Carter di Londra, autore di altri Spartiti musicali, e di pregievolissime e dotte composizioni sacre e profane, ha terminato una sua opera nuova, 'Il Nerone.' Rinomati maestri Italiani ai quali venne fatto sentire il nuovo lavoro del M. Carter, dichiarono bellissimma quella musica, piena d'ispirazione melodica, e di Sapienti e leggiadre combinazioni armoniche." A contributor, on whose judgment reliance may be placed, reports very favourably of another (English) opera from the prolific pen of Mr. George Carter, "Fair Rosamond," of which the overture, march, and ballet, are in the hands of Mr. Manns, of the Crystal Palace concerts. The performance of the music by this renowned band, an orchestre d'élite, is likely to add another laurel to the wreath which Mr. Manns has won for our English composers.

Waterston & Sons, Edinburgh and London).—Charming children's books, illustrated with true humour, delicate in fancy without exaggeration, and in every way artistic. The same good taste characterises both words and music. Mr. A. Scott Gatty has done good service in his many clever and tasty contributions to this class of children's books, and our young people ought to be thankful for the many skilful efforts which are constantly being made to instruct them without weariness, and to amuse them with such winning grace and genuine playfulness.

Rky of Sunshine, Carl le Duc; La Priere d'une Vierge, T. Badanzewska; Ecoutez Moi, J. Funke; Gipsy Rondo, Haydn; Carnival of Venice, J. Asten; The Merry Peasant, Schumann; Slumber Song, Schumann; Melody in F, Rubinstein; Edelweiss, Gustav Lange; Les Cloches du Monastere, Lefebure Wély; Air de Louis XIII., Henry Ghys; The Battle of Prague, F. Kotzwara; True Love, Gavotte, Johann Resch; Stephanie, Gavotte, A. Czibulka; Home, Sweet Home, S. Thalberg. All Paternoster Row editions, edited and fingered by A. H. Brown. (F. Pitman, Paternoster Row). Zweite Barcarole, Op. 23. Gustav Wolff. (W. Dietrich, Leipzig). A goodly number of these pieces are old favourites, played industriously enough five-and-twenty years ago. "The Ray of Sunshine," a more recent production, is taking, and is neatly written in the mazurka style. "The Carnival of Venice" is here printed in A flat. The writer, without being able to say which is the original key, remembers a version in A natural, which was certainly more playable, as many of the passages in that key lie better for the hands. A new edition of Schumann's standard pieces and Rubinstein's effective Melody will be welcome. Gustav Lange's "Edelweiss" is a pretty showy piece in triple measure in E flat. The "Air de Louis XIII." is a popular gavotte. "The Battle of Prague," dear to our great-grandmothers, was the precursor of one class of shamelessly realistic programme music, with unblushing imitations of cannons roaring and trumpets blowing. It is in this edition dignified, as of old, by the wrongly applied title of Sonata. The music shows talent enough in its way; but its unfortunate composer is said to have been found dead, hanging, the story goes, in a public-house. Certainly he might have had a brighter career had he made better use of his abilities and kept better company. "True Love" is an effective gavotte in a showy style, having piquant and sprightly figures. "Home, sweet home" again reprinted; has been a fortune to the music publishers, for the composer never took any steps to protect his copyright, and allowed everybody apparently to print the piece without payment, making it popular during his lifetime by his own unique performance. Such an obliging genius must have been greatly admired by the publishers, who are said to delight in music they have nobody to pay for the use of. These pianoforte solos are well and carefully edited and fingered. The Barcarolle by Gustav Wolff is fanciful, delicate, and musicianly. Without being servilely planned for the display of cheap playing attainments, it is an effective concert or drawing-room solo, and its performance will reward the artistic player in search of an elegant, light little piece.

Andante in G (Batiste) as Pianoforte Solo and Duet. Boyton Smith. (Weekes & Co., Hanover Street.)—A conscientious and effective arrangement of one of the most popular of the lighter kind of French organ music.

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in D by C. E. Miller. (Novello and Co.)—This was composed for the London Church Choir Association Festival in St. Paul's on Nov. 8th. The "Magnificat" is dignified and musicianly; and the composer has taken most commendable pains in his endeavours to duly express the varying character of the words whilst preserving a decorous and church-like style throughout. There is, too, as in the "Gloria," an effective use of unison singing; a style so strangely neglected by the earlier Church composers. The misjudged rise of the bass of a major seventh in the close of this movement is one of few points the critic could speak of save with cordial approval. The "Nunc Dimittis" receives a pastoral treatment in six-four measure; changing emphatically into common time at the words, "And to be the glory." The "Gloria" is interesting and effective. The Service deserves to be well known.

Correspondence.

HENRY SMART'S "JACOB."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—An error touching the above oratorio in a reply from "S. S. S." occurs in your last number. "Jacob" is not published by Cramer & Co., but by Joseph Williams, Berners Street.

Yours faithfully,

FESTIVAL CHAMBER CONCERT IN HONOUR OF SPOHR, on July 2nd, 1843.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In the "Reminiscences of an Old Reporter," which appeared in your issue of to-day, there is a description of the curious Chamber Concert with déjeuner à la fourchette, which was given by Mr. Alsager, co-editor of Times, in honour of Louis Spohr. In speaking about this princely entertainment, the writer says, "that notwithstanding he had forgotten the selection of music performed at the concert, "you may rely on my words that no grinding ballads or 'royalty' songs found a place in the scheme." As a proof of the veracity of the writer's words, I may perhaps be permitted, through the medium of this paper, to have the honour to supply the "Old Reporter" with the following copy of the programme of music, performed on that "Golden Sunday":—

QUEEN SQUARE SELECT SOCIETY.

Musical Festival in honour of the arrival of Spohr in London, Sunday, July 2nd, 1843.

ACT 1

Double Quartet, No. 1	Spohr.
Quintette (Pianoforte, Flute, Clarionet, Horn and Bassoon)	,,
Double Quartet, No. 2	,,
Nonetto	,,

Dejeuner a la Fourchette.

ACT 2.

Quintet	Spohr.
Ottetto	,,
Double Quartet, No. 3	,,

To commence at 2 o'clock. Dejeuner at 5 o'clock.
Second act to commence at 7 o'clock."

The eminent violinist, Spohr, must have felt highly gratified, not only with the magnificent "Festival," but also to see how a company of fifty persons would listen until late in the evening with wrapt attention to his music without evincing the least sign of weariness.

Yours very truly,

HILDEGARD WERNER.
R.A.M. of Stockholm.

SCALE-COLOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—As Mr. Matthey asks for information, I must try to give it to him so far as I am able, but I cannot help thinking both himself and Mr. Foxall to be, at least, premature in characterising the very notion of a physical correlation between musical notes and colours as an absurdity. For my part, I have never propounded such a notion, the correlation being to my mind rather psychological than physical. I should, however, be no more inclined to deny the physical correlation than to deny the existence of living beings in the planet Mars, since, as yet, so far as I have been able to discover, there is nothing like a proof to be found either for assertion or denial. If Mr. Matthey or Mr. Foxall can give any proof of their negative, it will be interesting to read it.

As to the psychological correlation which I believe to exist, the question is a very difficult one, but may be put thus: Supposing that I characterise light sky-blue as a gaudy, flaring colour, and, on the other hand, maintain that bright scarlet is soft and sweet, would that indicate any defect in my power of mental appreciation? Of course it would, so much so as to destroy all confidence in my judgment of character. These are extreme examples, but the difference between this pair of colours and any other is one only of degree, not of kind; and if there are definite characters attaching to these colours, other colours also must each have their character, though it may not be so clearly marked.

As to the notes of music, the first question to be asked is whether they also have each a separate character. This, I think, must be answered in the affirmative, otherwise we should not be able to distinguish them. I once had the pleasure of conversing with an Oxford Doctor of Music, who maintained stoutly that we could only reckon by the intervals, until I asked him whether it would be impossible to tell if a piece of music were being executed in C or in G, when he was obliged to admit that there would be a great difference. The difference, however, is only of degree, and just as there are many men who could easily distinguish between mauve and orange, but would scarcely see the difference between azure and blue, so there are probably many first-rate musicians who cannot tell whether a piece is being played in C or in C sharp.

It by no means follows, however, that because both colours and musical notes have each a separate character by which they may be distinguished, therefore those characters must agree. This is the point at issue, and it is here we may find the utility of translating music into colour, to see whether the characters do agree. As far as I have gone hitherto, the sameness of character to be found in the musical originals, and the translations which I have made from them, has been very striking, and I am in hopes, now that I have pointed out the separate colours to be used for the purpose, of seeing others engaged upon the same work. It might be taken up, I think, as a new and almost the highest branch of decorative art, so to use colours with a meaning and purpose in place of the meaningless repetitions of some equally meaningless harmony, which now do duty for decoration in England. I say "almost the highest," because it is certainly a higher branch of the same art, when a painter of human forms, instead of translating from the works of musicians, makes his music for himself, and expresses it in colour. Such music in colour is very rare, now-a-days, at the Royal Academy. It may, however, be found in abundance in the works of Italian painters of the time of Raffaelle, and it might soon be developed in England if the training of art-students included a course of translations from music. Meanwhile, the question of the agreement in character between the musical notes and the colours which I have pointed out as correlative, is one which I submit to the good judgment of artists and musicians, and which is only to be determined by repeated experiments, although colour-music will be, in itself, equally valuable, as a system of finding harmonies, whether the chords of colour have, or have not, a right to the musical names which I give them. If I observe a sunset exhibiting certain colours, which I call D F sharp A C, I may be quite wrong, and in giving to the colours that name, or any other musical name; but still the combination will always have the character of a chord of the minor seventh. And to show the use which may be made of the characters thus inherent in the various chords, perhaps you will allow a brief illustration. Taking a sketch of Mr. Long's "Egyptian Feast," I coloured it in the key of C, using the dominant chord, C B D, or orange, purple and blue, for the cycle of guests, and the tonic, C E G, for the mummy and its attendant priest. Then instead of taking F A C, the subdominant, which would be the ordinary harmony for a background, I used D F A C, blue, yellow, red and mauve for the background and the slaves in front on the left, thereby getting a peculiar accent of sadness on the F, brown, pink, which I used for the dusky Ethiopians. I afterwards satisfied myself, by transposing the harmony (for another picture) into the key of F, which gave me scarlet instead of yellow for the third of the minor chord, that the effect was due to the nature of the chord and not to any peculiarity of the colour, brown pink. This is only one out of hundreds of ways in which the musical chords might be turned to advantage by artists.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. P. BETHELL.

Passing Events.

Mr. Maas is likely to be the next accession to the Carl Rosa Company.

The Carl Rosa Company are successfully performing in leading Scotch towns.

Miss Alice Aloof gives her second concert at the Brixton Hall, on Nov. 13th.

Mr. H. Holmes has arranged for a series of Chamber Concerts at the Steinway Hall.

There is a probability of German Opera in London next season under Herr Richter.

"Madme. Boniface," a new opera by M. Lecome, was produced recently at the Bouffes Parisiens.

On Oct. 30th Mr. E. Spark gave a concert at the Public Hall, Worcester, with an excellent touring party.

The Maritzburg Philharmonic Society lately performed Aspa's "The Gipsies," and Cowen's "Rose Maiden."

One of Mr. J. Baillie Hamilton's improved vocalions has been introduced into Leeds Parish Church for use with or without the organ.

It is understood that Liszt's "Pianoforte School," to which he has devoted the study of many years, is now to be published in three large volumes.

The committee of the Liverpool National Eisteddfod propose £20 instead of £50 for the best cantata, and £210 for the chief choral competition prize.

The twenty-first anniversary arrangements of the Church of England Temperance Society include a Festival Service in Westminster Abbey, on Nov. 19th.

The Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge offer a new book called "The Rehearsal, and other Stories of Musicians and Singers" adapted from the German.

The new comic opera "Falka" at the Comedy Theatre, by Chassaigne, has many pretty catching melodies, and the young composer has done fairly well in this doubtless early work.

It is said that owing to the interest taken in the repetition of Dr. Stainer's "Mary Magdalen" at the Bow and Bromley Institute to-night, all the tickets have been sold in advance.

A society for male voices, the "West London Choral Society," has been formed, and is under the direction of Mr. F. Scarsbrook. The place of meeting is 98, Ledbury Road, Bayswater.

On Monday last, the Abbé Franz Liszt celebrated his seventy-second birthday at Jena, where his oratorio, "Saint Elizabeth," was performed at the Court Theatre, in honour of the day.

The Signal has it that two new pianoforte compositions by Rubinstein are in the press: a trio in C minor and an "unplayable" Concert-Etude for the young English pianist, Eugene d'Albert.

At the Chelsea Congregational Church, Markham-square, King's-road, a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," was given on Nov. 1st, in aid of the fund for the completion of the organ.

An exhibition of ten guineas per annum has been presented for competition amongst pianoforte students of the Guildhall School of Music by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore-street.

The Alhambra will be inaugurated on the 10th, when Mr. F. Clay's "Golden Ring" is to be produced. A large and efficient orchestra has been got together and placed under the direction of M. Riviere.

The Nineteenth Century Art Society, exhibiting British and Foreign modern pictures, held a private press view at the Conduit Street Galleries, on Nov. 3rd. The society is likely to prove a useful body, and to assist greatly the artistic world.

Mr. Walter Lucas, of Douglas, Isle of Man, gave a concert recently. His pianoforte solos were a Fantasia by Weber, Rubinstein's well-known melody, and Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith." The concert scheme included some well known vocal pieces.

We understand that Mr. Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm ("The Lord is King,") written for and produced with so much success at the recent Leeds Festival, has already been selected for performance again at Leeds, by the Choral Society, and at Wolverhampton, Stafford, and Eton College.

The Islington Musical Society (conductor Mr. Wm. L. Frost), meet on Mondays in the Lecture Hall, at the rear of Claremont Chapel, Pentonville Road (close to the Angel), for the practice of high-class music. The Hon. Sec. is Mr. Percy Collins, 22, Milner Square, N. An orchestra is in formation. Gentlemen willing to take part are invited to come forward.

The Leeds Band of Hope League gave a concert in the Leeds Town Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was made up of songs, duets, glees and choruses, taken from well-known temperance and other sources. Miss Briscoe and Miss Nicholson were the principal vocalists, and Dr. Spark presided at the organ. The choir consisted of about 500 voices from various Bands of Hope in the Union.

Says L'Independente (Trieste), of Thursday, Oct. 18th, 1883:—New opera: Mr. George Carter, of London, the author of various sacred works, and of esteemed and clever compositions, both sacred and secular, has finished his new opera, "Nerone." Renowned Italian musicians who have seen the work, speak of the music as being beautiful, full of melodious inspiration and learned and pleasing orchestration.

The Athenæum says: "The Argentina Theatre at Rome is to be shortly opened for a season of opera. 'Mignon' is the first work to be given; and among other operas which it is intended to produce are Delibes's 'Lakmé,' Bizet's 'Carmen' (a novelty at Rome), Halévey's 'La Reine de Chypre,' Giovannini's 'Tito Vezio,' and a new opera, 'Il Conte di Gleichen,' by Signor Auteri."

The competition for the Mendelssohn Scholarship now vacant is announced to take place early in the approaching year. The scholarship, the value of which is at least £80 per annum, is conferred with the intention of enabling the scholar either to go abroad to finish his (or her) education at a foreign conservatoire or to attain that object at home with increased facilities under the direction and at the choice of the committee. Sir A. Sullivan was the first Mendelssohn scholar, and Mr. D'Albert, who is now appearing as a successful pianist in Germany, was the last. The scholarship is regarded as a great honour as well as a valuable prize, among musical students.

The Querist.

Organs of any magnitude contracted for. Professional attendance when desired.

Extract from testimony by E. H. Turpin, Esq., of College of Organists, referring to organ at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, S.E.:—

"To Messrs. Hele and Co. very high praise is due for the judgment and skill with which they have accomplished the rebuilding of the instrument. All the foundation work I noticed to be round, even, and admirably voiced. The 'chorus' struck me as being well balanced and decisive, without being intrusive or too pronounced above the 8-feet work. The reeds are of very high quality, at once rich and characteristic in tone. The solo registers I found to be after their several types—delicate and finished in quality of tone and in their voicing. The mechanism throughout a trying night's work never failed me, and it is everywhere true, reliable, and admirable. My impressions were so pleasant, that I feel it is a duty to express an unqualified approval of the labours of the very able organ builders."

IMPROVISATION.

To improvise well upon the piano or organ requires mental power of no ordinary calibre. It is one of the highest and most enjoyable gifts given to musicians. The extempore player is more than a composer: he invents the theme, and then proceeds to develop it without any preparation. He must have an active imagination—the ground soil and source of all true art; and he must also have a productive imagination to paint in vivid or sombre tone colours. Tone is a very thorough medium for expressing sentiments, and the various keys (major and minor) will be found to express nearly every phase of human feeling. There are bright keys and there are dull keys, light and heavy, grave and gay, and the improvisor should bear in mind a few of these, in order to give more effect to his melodies by introducing them, as it were, in the right key. He who searches for keys will surely forget his ideas the while! The hands must be under the control of the mind and must readily and quickly follow all its dictates.

As the orator, so the improvisor. The one thinks and speaks, and his tongue gives utterance to his thoughts with ready fluency. And so the other. The mind must be ahead of the utterance. So should the improvisor play. He must also be possessed of a certain amount of quick discrimination, or discerning at once whether to accept or reject thoughts or ideas as they present themselves in rapid succession. And, further, he must not forget to play with expression, or let the working out mentally interfere, in the slightest degree, with the execution mechanically, lest the performance be deficient in spite of the excellent ideas. When I speak of improvisation, I do not include the after-dinner-playing-by-ear style, which is sometimes unfortunately heard: the subject, for obvious reasons, is better left untouched. Let it, however, be said that only those should extemporise in public who can do so in an artistic manner. Memory plays an exceedingly important part to the extempore player: he must be able to retain the ideas he has chosen, and work in, with ease, the original principal subject after the various episodes and modulations. This comes by practice. He must know the rules of harmony, and chords, their constructions, relations, and resolutions, so as to enable him properly to put his ideas together.

All the great tone poets were improvisors.

Bach, at the age of eighteen, when organist of the Church at Armstadt, excited much attention both far and near with his wonderful powers of extemporising. The impression he made on Reinken made the veteran, embracing him, exclaim, "I thought this art had died out; now that I see it still lives, I can depart in peace."

Handel, when playing publicly, used to give himself to the workings of his inexhaustible genius.

Of Mozart it was written by Clementi, "I never had thus far heard any one play with so much spirit and grace. Especially was I surprised at his adagios and extemporaneous variations, to which the Emperor gave the theme." From his concert programmes we gather that he also improvised much in public, and from his biographers that he was always eminently successful in his playing.

Rider, who died in 1857, an aged man of eighty years, said: "Even now, an aged man as I am, I hear the heavenly, never-to-be-forgotten harmonies, and I shall go to my grave convinced of this one fact—that there was but one Mozart."

Beethoven was even still greater at this great art. The fire of his imagination, his modulations, and his wonderful treatment of any given theme, were the subject of the admiration of all who were fortunate enough to hear him. It is said that the power of his improvisations far surpassed that of his playing written compositions. Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Liszt, too, were all extempore players. But, alas! this great power is no longer cultivated as it was. We never hear a modern pianist improvise.

Musicians should try their powers, and endeavour to cultivate this grand old long-forgotten art.

ERNEST BIRCH.

THE SONGS OF SCHUBERT.

The following letter has been addressed to the editor of the Times:—Sir,—I am anxious to obtain the help of your readers in reference to a new critical edition of the Songs of Schubert, now in progress in Germany. During the fifty-five years that have passed since Schubert's early death, so many alterations have crept into the songs that the original text of the music is in many cases widely departed from. The task of rectifying the published editions by the autographs, or by early copies, has been undertaken by Mr. Max Friedlander, a musician and singer well known in London, whose judgment, accuracy, and enthusiasm alike fit him for the work. The labour involved is great, owing to the wide distances over which the manuscripts are scattered. Mr. Friedländer is at present in Vienna, where the rich collections of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Messrs. N. Dumba, Bauernfeld (Schubert's friend), Brahms and Franz Lachner (the composers), have been thrown open to him without reserve. He has received similar aid from Mdme. Schumann, Mr. Stockhausen, Mr. Karl Meinert, Count Victor Wimpffen, Geheimrath von Löper, and other possessors of Schubert autographs. Our own Professor Max Müller, son of the Wilhelm Müller who wrote the touching poems of the Schöne Müllerin and the Wintereise, two of Schubert's most noted sets of songs, has contributed a preface, which cannot fail to add to the value of the edition.

My object in writing is to bespeak the help of all possessors of autographs of Schubert's songs in this country. It will be a great favour, and much assistance to an important work, if all such will have the great kindness to communicate on the subject at their early convenience with me, or with Messrs. Peters, of Leipsic, the publishers of the edition.—Your obedient servant, GEORGE GROVE, Royal College of Music, Kensington Gore, W.

CUTTINGS FROM FERDINAND PRAEGER'S RHYMES FOR YOUNG AND OLD CHILDREN.

When notes were without stems forsooth,
And much in music yet uncouth,
They were called points: and Counterpoint
When nota contra notum joined
And tune 'pon tune by laws' decree
Of their fixed grammar did agree.
But if the added tune had more
Of smaller notes, say two, three, four,
Then Florid Counterpoint became
Of this extended form the name.
Should your first subject then admit
That as a bass it could be fit
To underlie the second theme,
Then Double Counterpoint this scheme
Was termed, and looked upon
As grand achievement nobly won.

The Walworth Choral Society gave a capital performance of Haydn's "Creation," on Monday last, at the Surrey Masonic Hall. The soloists were Madame Worrell, Mr. John Cornwall (tenor), and Mr. Frank May (bass), who admirably acquitted themselves in the parts allotted to them. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. E. Curtis, for his untiring efforts in connection with this society, both as choirmaster and conductor. The choruses on this occasion were, as at other times, extremely well sung.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Tragic" (Op. 81)	Brahms.
Concerto for strings	Bach.
Air, "In Native Worth" ("Creation")	Haydn.
Mr. Maas.
Melody and "A L'Espagnole"	Cowen.
(First time at these concerts).
Symphony No. 7, in A	Beethoven.
Walther's Prize Song, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner.
Mr. Maas.
Ballet, "The Dance of the Houris" ("La Gioconda")	Ponchielli.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

Why the Crystal Palace people should again alter the time of their concert from 3.10 to 3 o'clock, I cannot imagine. A long train, full of people, arrived at the Low Level station on Saturday last, some minutes behind time—2.50. This is no unusual occurrence; and even if the train is punctual, it is quite impossible to be in the gallery of the concert-room until some minutes after 3. The consequence is, that a great many miss the first number in the programme, and cause a great commotion at the early part of the concert, much to the annoyance of those who are able to be quite in time. This unfortunate arrangement must deter not a few from attending these delightful concerts.

As Brahms's overture was noticed not very long ago in the Musical Standard, nothing need be said of it on this occasion beyond the fact of its producing a great impression. Of the concerto of Sebastian Bach, it is a real pleasure to speak. It is the third of a set of six which were first published in 1850, and some of them are remarkable as being amongst the earliest attempts to combine wind and stringed instruments. The one now before us is for strings only. The charm of the work consists not only in its constantly clever and brilliant ideas, but the ever varying, continuous, changeful flow of melody renders it still more delightful. It hardly need be said how superbly the ideas are worked out.

Mr. Cowen's contribution was quite worthy of his well-known ability as an orchestral writer. His scoring is redundant with the most fascinating combinations and contrivances. The violini sordini with harp; the unison of reeds and 'celli, with pizzicato for contra bassi, with nice touches for the horns, and judicious use of the trombones, &c.; give to the work a colour and character which is very taking. The audience, indeed, were so taken with the Spanish melody as to demand its repetition. Beethoven's symphony was of course greatly enjoyed.

Mr. Maas sang his two songs—chosen perhaps by way of contrast—in a superb manner. R. S.

BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONY IN A.

Only think of two hearings of this immense work—the writer's special favourite—in one day! I am sorry to notice an apparent defiance on the part of two great powers last Saturday, but that is not my business. To avoid odious and invidious comparisons, I may at once extol Mr. Manns's performance of the symphony as surpassingly excellent, a fully developed whole, with the nicest attention to details; for at the Crystal Palace individual artists not only know their métier, but are always "going together," like the steeds of Phœbus Apollo. I hardly know which particular feature to select for praise. The wail of the violins at the end of the "dactyl and spondee" movement touched the inmost soul. The horns came out well in the scherzo, and Mr. Manns, active and energetic, without bustle or fussy demonstrations, fully evolved that delicate modulation from the Trio in D major back to the Scherzo in F. The elephantine jump in the finale, on the second accent of the bar, where the quaint theme in C sharp minor occurs, was truly exciting. Mr. Manns got through his weighty work in 41 minutes; Herr Richter, the same evening, in 45.

Herr Richter, loving Beethoven, of course left no stone unturned to bring out this noble "No. 7" into boldest relief, and the process may be reported as stupendous. The masterful swing of the bâton elicited the responsive action, as it were, of one man from a host of eighty, and on dissection of the score, the nicest points were all clearly discernible, as the separate features on the face of Venus Victrix might be studied apart from that noble contour of unsurpassable beauty.

A. M.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

These splendid performances reached the end of their autumn season last Saturday with the following programme:—

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven.
Orchestral Suite in D	Bach.
Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner.
Symphony No. 7, in A	Beethoven.

The pleasant, old-fashioned suite was fully appreciated, and by no means out of place among its more modern brethren; for all that is good and true is eternal.

The only Wagner number on the programme called forth, as is usual at these concerts, the greatest amount of enthusiasm. Ere it subsided, an evergreen wreath was presented to Herr Richter, which was the signal for renewed cheers. Richter, with an innate gracefulness which is the secret of much of his power, placed the wreath on the desk of the leader, pointed it out to the orchestra, and repeated the "Meistersinger" overture: thus unmistakably transferring the honour to its wondrous author in the first place, and after him to his grand interpreters. Two of the second violins who had left their seats during the applause, feeling sure the first part of the concert was over, slid back rather like culprits when the entirely unexpected "encore" reached their astonished ears.

And now, before the spring concerts begin, will some musician of understanding find out for us and define what "programme music" is; that our analytical programmes may be clearer and more logical?

Goethe has somewhere said that there is perhaps no word which presents exactly the same idea to any two minds: undoubtedly the term "programme music" awakens very different currents of thought in the minds of different musicians. The time has now surely arrived when the terms, if used at all, should be made to mean something—something that all musicians alike will accept as a definition of some particular form of art, honourable or otherwise. At present "programme music" is usually considered a term of opprobrium—it signifies, in a vague sort of way, a production without form or internal life; a weak, rambling imitation of the sounds we hear, without reaching their spiritual meaning. It is true that Sir G. Grove (whose analysis of Beethoven's symphonies are reprinted, as occasion requires, in the Richter books) does not countenance this interpretation; for, analysing the "Pastoral" Symphony, he writes:—"Programme music is music in which the endeavour is made to represent a given scene or occurrence by the aid of instruments only, without the help of voices." But this talented and enthusiastic writer cannot have made his interpretation clear, even to his own mind; for he has elsewhere called some airs with variations, as absolute as any by Herz, "programme music," because the author has chosen to give them a title. (Vide analysis in Crystal Palace book of Goldmark's "Country Wedding" Symphony.) Are we, then, to look upon Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" as "programme music"? By this rule we shall have to call some of the most absolute music "programme"; and some which is anything but absolute, having an evident, though unexpressed, poetical basis, will be classed as absolute. What is it, then, that constitutes "programme music"? Is it the fact of having a title, though the form be strictly classical and symphonic, such as Beethoven's "Pastoral"? If so, why is not the C minor also "programme music"? Beethoven had a distinct poetical idea attached to both; wherein lies the difference? Haydn—one of the most absolute of musicians—almost invariably wrote from some fixed idea; he had some story in his mind as he wrote his symphonies and chamber music: if he had attached the stories to his scores, would these most absolute compositions in the world have been thereby suddenly converted into "programme music"? Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony is probably (according to Sir G. Grove) "programme music"; but if he had called it simply "Symphony No. 3, in E flat," it would be as absolute as is No. 1, in B flat. "Programme music" is then, as it appears at present, a fearful and wonderful thing. Who will tear away its veil of mystery, and reveal to us whether it is really an honourable art-work, another name for "poetical music," and including such works as Berlioz's "Harold," Liszt's Symphonic Poems and Raff's Symphonies, or merely the lowest form of sensuous imitation of the baldest and most unpoetical coarseness, boasting nothing nobler than Hiller's "Sentinel," another writer's "Turkish Patrol,"

"The Battle of Prague" and Pridham's more modern "Delhi March," wherein the exact moment is announced when the sun rises, the enemy approaches, the wounded groan, &c., &c.

Till we are agreed as to where "programme music" begins and ends, let us, by all means, avoid the use of the term. Let a distinct place be found for it on our list of art-appellations, and may it, in future years, be more faithfully defined than the term "sonata" is in one of our English dictionaries, where it stands revealed to the astonished artist as "a tune for an instrument only."

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

These concerts were resumed last week with their usual conservative programme, and (it would appear from the crowded attendance), more than their usual popularity.

PROGRAMME.

Quintet in D major, for two violins, two violas, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Hollander, Zerbini, and Piatti.

Songs, "I'm Rhein," and "Ich grolle nicht" ..... Schumann.
Mr. Santley.

Rondeau Brillant in E flat major (Op. 62) ..... Weber.

Nocturne in F major, Op. 15, No. 1, and Mazurka in A flat major, (Op. 59), No. 2 ..... Chopin.
(For pianoforte alone).
M. Vladimir de Pachmann.

Sonata in D major (Op. 5), No. 1, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... Corelli.
Madame Norman-Néruda.

Cantique, "Le Nom de Marie" ..... Gounod.
Mr. Santley.

Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Schumann.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti.

Accompanist .. .. .. Mr. ZERBINI.

When three artists so popular as M. de Pachmann, Mdme. Norman-Néruda, and Mr. Santley take leading parts in a concert, it is no wonder that enthusiasm should be the order of the day—only, unhappily, our enthusiasm is not tempered with discretion; neither are the praises of our great ones sung "with understanding." The good-will of, for instance, such people as applaud M. de Pachmann and Mdme. Néruda's solos, but who walk out unceremoniously in the middle of a movement of Schumann's glorious Quintet, is rather an insult than a glory to a true artist. Those who remained till the end did even worse, by applauding in the noisiest manner and making a rush for their coats and hats just before the coda of the finale, when we were neither on the key-note, nor anywhere near it. The quintet has been heard twenty-seven times at these concerts alone, and yet we do not know that its conclusion is not reached till the first subject of the opening movement has reappeared. We may be a musical people, as we often hear we are—from ourselves—nevertheless, it must be conceded that we need an immense deal of education. But apart from what we know or do not know, we should on all occasions look to the performers to ascertain when they allow us to applaud. We should never forget that they are the greater, we the lesser; and the moment when they are listening to the final vibrations of the harmonies they have produced is not the moment for us to disturb the air with noisy delight. "Where would the artist be without our favour?" is a question often heard from English lips—a question that may well raise a blush of shame. Without pausing to answer it from the lives of many poets who lived and died without our "favour," we may ask in return, "Where should we be without the artist?" Can even the lowest of us, who thinks at all on such matters, bear to think how low we should be if art influence could be taken out of our lives? Let us then, endeavour to honour our artists with an honour more worthy of them and more honourable to ourselves.

M. de Pachmann was heard at his best in the Mazurka, where he appeared as the most sympathetic interpreter of the most polished music in the world. A different accent, a few notes given with unusual prominence, placed the whole piece in a new light, giving it a refinement and nobleness undreamt of before. This was a performance, calculated to make the musician reflect what slight differences divide the commonplace from the most exquisite refinement. Being recalled, M. de Pachman played the favourite little Valse in D flat.

Mr. Santley, who is entitled to be looked upon as the interpreter of Gounod par excellence, sang a simple French romance after "Le Nom de Marie," was it a MS. of his own?

Mdme. Norman-Néruda performed her solo with her usual success. The performance of the Mozart quintet left nothing, and the Schumann quintet but little, to be desired.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

At the third concert of the season on Monday evening (November 12th), the Director presented the annexed programme:—

PART 1.

Quartet in E minor (Op. 44), No. 2, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Mendelssohn.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti.

Preislied, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.

Fantasia in C minor (dedicated to Madame Mozart) .. Mozart.

Impromptu in A flat (Op. 90), No. 4 ..... Schubert.
(First time).
M. Vladimir de Pachmann.

PART 2.

Trio in G minor (Op. 8), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Chopin.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti.

Evening Song, "Good night, beloved" ..... Blumenthal.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.

Sonata in A major (No. 27 of Hallé's edition), for pianoforte and violin ..... Mozart.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann, and Madame Norman-Néruda.

Accompanist .. .. .. Signor ROMILI.

The String Quartet in E minor has only been played fourteen times since April, 1859; the one in E flat comes forward much more frequently. Yet the work is surpassingly fine, and full of features indicative of supreme genius. The solidity—here an apt word—of the first allegro is testified by the ingenious interweaving of themes. The thoroughly original and piquant scherzo in the tonic major makes a golden bridge to the andante in G, compared by Sir G. A. Macfarren to a sigh in the air over undulating waters; and lastly, the final presto agitato, with its second subject on a pedal-bass and the brilliant coda where viola and violin play in octaves, "caps the bell," as they say in Yorkshire. Mendelssohn thought highly of this quartet, especially the andante.

M. Vladimir De Pachmann (engaged for a fourth "Popular," if not more), had his hands quite full on Monday night, and again evoked genuine enthusiasm. The choice of pieces, on the whole, cannot be considered the happiest. Mozart's fantasia, said to bear date A.D. 1782, strikes the hearer as the skeleton, or the torso, of a sonata. Well adapted, however, for practice and the display of technique, are its numerous flights of "grace" notes, in arpeggios, and the decomposition of the rhythm into demisemiquavers and semi-demisemiquavers. Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, now done to death by schoolgirls, is very inferior to others of the seven, notably the one in B flat; pupils not well versed in scales and "signatures" would be startled by that transition from the dominant (inverted) of D flat to C sharp major. An encore produced a well-known mazurka of Chopin.

The Polish pianist came to the front in Part II., but his piece here failed to please the connoisseurs. The Trio in G minor, confessedly an early work, must be denounced as an unfavourable specimen of the master. Dull, overlong, and rambling, as if in pursuit of will-o'-the-wisp ideas, the composition was felt to be a trial of patience. A musician who sat behind remarked that the pianoforte part "was beautifully played, but not worth the trouble." The odour of the lamp, and the lack of invention, are disclosed in all the four movements: the Adagio in E flat is a mere round of self-asserting recitatives for the pianoforte, with obsequiously acquiescent answers from the strings. Mozart's duet sonata came as a gratifying relief after the trio, and was charmingly played by both artists. This work bears the date of A.D. 1787, and appears in the same catalogue as "Don Giovanni." M. De Pachmann's delicacy of touch, finesse of style, and clear enunciation of the florid passages, commanded general admiration. The "Preislied" of Wagner has been sung three times within as many weeks (last Saturday at Sydenham). A weekly contemporary complains that the song is being hackneyed, but who can object to the repetition of so delicious a melody? M. De Pachmann intends to hold two special recitals on Dec. 10th and 17th.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

The very interesting and in many respects admirable performance of Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" on Oct. 30th, proved that the choir of the Institute is destined to be a power in the list of our London musical institutions. Although the middle parts are somewhat too weak at present and wanting in pure tone, the external parts are of the very best: bright, clear, decided soprani, and solid voiced, full toned and prompt in attack bassi. The general effect of the whole is often most admirable. The choir performed Dr. Stainer's music with a loving enthusiasm delightful to think of. The defects of the performance were, notwithstanding the presence of many of our leading instrumentalists, in the orchestral department. These same defects may be attributed to that want of understanding between conductor and band which can only be completely established by frequent, or at least sufficient, rehearsals; and, it must be added, that a work which deserves an orchestral rendering imperatively demands and calls for thoroughly efficient rehearsal. Perhaps the spirited committee at Bow will ultimately see their way to the formation of a standing orchestra in connection with their splendidly managed Institute. Such a scheme would enable them to do a service to the locality and the musical world which will in artistic usefulness transcend all the good things they have already done—that is, to familiarise the people's ears with the orchestral masterpieces of the great composers, properly and efficiently rendered. The solos were, upon this same memorable occasion—the first performance in London of Dr. Stainer's hitherto most dramatic and powerful work—sung to perfection by Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King. The whole performance was a triumph for the Institute. Dr. Stainer's work gains ground upon examination. It is expressive and yet never weak; it is dramatic, yet never too realistic or inconsistent. Mr. McNaught must be congratulated upon the obvious pains he has taken in the production of the cantata.

Last Saturday, Dr. Stainer's "Mary Magdalen" was repeated. The soloists were; Misses Ambler and Ada South, Messrs. Kenningham and Brereton. The fine choir of the Institute fully sustained their reputation under the able conductorship of Mr. McNaught. Mr. Willie Hodge was the accompanying organist, and his artistic playing and admirable tact claim for him very high credit indeed. The whole performance was another event to congratulate the committee upon.

On Monday the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert. Vocalists: Miss Minnie Gwynne, Miss Frances Hipwell, and Mr. Edward Levetus; solo violin, Mr. H. Sternburg; solo pianoforte, Miss Clara Asher; accompanist, Mr. G. F. Bambridge; conductor, Mr. George Mount. The concert proved a great treat to the members and friends. The band played excellently; the only fault to be noticed, perhaps, was a slight want of steadiness in the andante of the "Italian" Symphony. The programme included Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," part of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, the popular "Turkish March" (Michaelis) encored, and Suppe's overture, "Pique Dame." Mr. Mount's gifted and very juvenile pupil, Miss Clara Asher, played Andante and Polonaise (Chopin), with much skill, and shows high promise for the future. Mr. Sternburg played in admirable style a polonaise for violin of his own. To-night, Mr. J. W. Phillips, an excellent and exceptionally gifted young organist, of Sheffield, will be the soloist. Miss A. Larkcom will be the vocalist, Mr. Lazarus the solo clarionet, and Mr. Fountain Meen the accompanist.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

On Wednesday, 14th November, the following selection of music was sung, under the direction of Dr. Bridge:—

Madrigal,	"I follow, lo! the footing"	Morley.
,,	"When all alone"	Converso.
,,	"Have I found her"	Bateson.
,,	"So gracious is thy sweet self"	Ferretti.
Anthem,	"Almighty God"	Ford.
Madrigal,	"Now ev'ry tree"	Weelkes.
Chorus,	"In these delightful pleasant groves"	Purcell.
Madrigal,	"All creatures now"	Bennet.
Madrigal,	"Hark! how the cheerful birds"	Prendergast.
,,	"Down in a valley"	Wilbye.
,,	"Ye nightingales"	Lasso.
Anthem,	"O Lord, grant the King"	Child.
Madrigal,	"In going to my lonely bed"	Edwards.
,,	"So saith my fair"	Marenzio.
,,	"Stay, Corydon"	Wilbye.
,,	"In pride of May"	Weelkes.

MR. J. B. BONAWITZ'S "HISTORICAL RECITALS."

The second Recital by Mr. J. B. Bonawitz was held at the Blüthner Rooms, Bayswater, on Wednesday evening, Nov. 7th, and proved quite as successful as the first, already reported at length. The scheme was again divided between deceased and living composers for the queen of instruments, if the modern pianoforte may be so termed. An old Latin exercise book laid down a law that "the whale, or as some say the herring, is king among fishes," but alas, the whale is no fish at all!

To return to Mr. Bonawitz. He won the greatest applause for the Sonata Appassionata, Haydn's Sonata, Chopin's Polonaise, Vogel's piece, and his own duet for two pianofortes, where Miss Cecilie Brousil rendered valuable assistance. The two "Lieder" of Mendelssohn were No. 1, from Book V in G major, and No. 5 from the same book, in A major. Beethoven's sonata was played with great vigour, the left hand powerful in the extreme. Mr. Bonawitz's scherzo is thought to be too weighty for its title, a left-handed compliment, perhaps, but a compliment nevertheless. Schubert's Marches (duet) were exceedingly effective. The next recital is on Nov. 21st. The list of numbers is subjoined, viz.: Toccata in D minor (Frohberger), (1637-1701); Canon in G minor (Thomas Ford), (1600-....); Fugue in G minor (Bach), (1685-1750); Air and variations in D minor (Handel), (1685-1759); Sonata in E flat major (Haydn), (1732-1809); Sonata Appassionata (Beethoven), (1770-1827); Marches in G minor and C major (duet) (Schubert), (1797-1828); Nocturne, No. 4 (Field), (1782-1837); Two Songs without Words (Mendelssohn), (1809-1847); Novellette, Op. 21, No. 8 (Schumann), (1810-1856); Polonaise, in A flat major (Chopin), (1809 1849); Introduction and Scherzo (Bonawitz); Chant sans Paroles (Tschaikowsky); Nordische Tanze (Grieg); Humoreske (Bernhardt Vogel); Duet for two pianofortes (Bonawitz), and March from "Tannhäuser" (Wagner-Liszt).

CHELSEA.

The Right-Hon. Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., presided last night at a public meeting held at the school-room of the Markham-square Congregational Church, to promote the establishment of an orchestral society for the district. Sir Charles, in the course of his opening address, said the movement had his most hearty sympathy, although he was present without any peculiar fitness and appeared before them as an example of failure in music. He was a musical student for a great many years of his life, and rather a hard student, both at the pianoforte and at harmony. But he altogether failed to become a musician, and could only acknowledge himself a humble example of failure. At the same time, his experience led him to the conclusion that the results of the study of music were not comparable by the successes. Music was extremely valuable as a training to all those who took part in it, and he did not think people made a mistake in giving up a good deal of time to the acquisition of a good knowledge of music, even if such knowledge did not result in success from a popular point of view. He thought it needless to say much on the general sympathy of the English public for good music, for they all knew that the great appreciation of the art was recorded in many familiar and apt quotations. In conclusion Sir Charles expressed his hope that the project would be successful, and stated that he should have much pleasure in acceding to the request of the executive to become a vice-president of the society. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the right hon. baronet for his attendance.

CHELTENHAM.

The first concert for the season of Mr. J. A. Matthew's Choral and Orchestral Society took place on Oct. 6th, at the Assembly Rooms, before a fairly large audience. The programme was devoted to selections from the Handel oratorios, as performed at the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace in June last, and it was an undertaking on Mr. Matthews's part in reproducing that which doubtless many of his audience heard so recently, if not to perfection, at any rate at the nearest point thereto. The vocalists on this occasion were Miss Julia Jones, soprano; Mdme. Florence Winn, contralto; Mr. Alfred Kenningham, tenor; and Mr. Fredk. Bevan, bass; assisted by a band and chorus, numbering in all some 150 performers. The chorus and band performed their share in the programme in a highly creditable manner, the chorus in one instance only being lacking in precision, in the chorus from "Joshua," "Glory to God," in which, however, the effect of the finale fully made up for the want of smartness at starting. The highest praise is due to Mr. J. A. Matthews, who conducted, for his efforts, and one is pleased to say that the fourteenth season of the society under his auspices has commenced in a most satisfactory manner with this the opening concert.

LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Nov. 13th.

Really there is nothing very stirring in any way in Liverpool, and certainly not in music, if I except the Promenade concerts started at the Bijou Opera House last week, under the conductorship of Mr. Karl Meyder. The concerts are given every evening, and on Saturdays a matinée takes place in addition to the evening performances. So far the audiences have been very good, as far as report goes, but before I can give any reliable information as to the band, the style of the performances, and the number and character of the audiences, a personal visit will be advisable, so that I will reserve further remarks till later on.

Mr. Hallé's second orchestral concert takes place this evening, the chief item being Beethoven's second symphony.

The National Eisteddfod of 1884 is to be held in Liverpool; and on Saturday, under very adverse circumstances as regards the weather, the Gorsedd (an ancient custom preceding and apparently giving the necessary sanction to the Eisteddfod itself), was held in Kensington Fields. A concert was given in the evening at Hope Hall, Madme. Edith Wynne being the principal vocalist.

To-morrow (Wednesday) evening, Mr. G. A. Audsley is to give the first of two musical lectures. The subject for to-morrow evening is Bach, his times and music. Mr. Audsley, who is a cultured and enthusiastic amateur, is to have the valuable assistance of Mr. H. A. Branscombe, who will give illustrations from the works of the old Leipsic contrapuntist.

Mr. Martin Schneider is continuing his organ recitals at Moseley Hill Church. The programme of last Saturday will be found in the proper column.

The Musical and Dramatic World, a musical paper lately published in Liverpool, and edited by a Liverpool amateur, has ceased to exist. For a local paper of its class it had a long existence.

Madme. Florence St. John has just completed a successful engagement at the Court Theatre, having appeared in two or three comic operas during the time.

All the Harvest festivals are now over, and so far as I can learn, there has not been a single one anywhere about here where the music has been particularly attractive in regard to novelty. A church festival of this kind gives plenty of opportunity and scope for new musical works, but advantage never seems to be taken of such a rare chance. J. J. M.

BEDFORD.

Bedford is a musical town and has good Institutes. Several excellent schools flourish there; the advantage of æsthetical culture can never be overlooked, and ought not to be neglected when artists from London make considerable sacrifices with a view to promote the interests of art. At the "Working Men's Institute," Mr. Bond Andrews and Herr Polonaski have projected, for this autumn a series of three monthly classical concerts. The first was to take place last (Friday) night, when a fine sonata of Niels Gade for pianoforte and violin in D minor and major headed the scheme. The music deserves to be heard, and often, in London. Brahms, Liszt, Rubinstein, and Wagner were duly recognised. Mr. Bond Andrews and Herr Polonaski have an extensive répertoire, and they are always acting conjointly. The grand "Ascherberg" pianoforte used on these occasions is a splendid instrument and greatly increases the effect of a fine performance.

LEEDS.

The recital on the Town Hall organ on Saturday evening had special reference to the Luther Commemoration, and a large audience assembled to do justice to the memory of the great reformer. Luther's Hymns, "Ein Feste Burg" ("Rejoice to-day with one accord") and the well-known advent hymn, "Great God, what do I see and hear," were sung by the audience with much heartiness. Dr. Spark also played in masterly style some organ solos, including Schellenberg's Fantasia on "Ein Feste Burg," an air and chorus from the Messiah, and Dr. Spark's own "Carillon Piece in F major," including chimes in a Cathedral, Nunc Dimittis, Magnificat, and Distant Bells. The latter piece so delighted the audience that it had to be repeated. The last item in the programme was the organ solo, Reminiscences of the Opera, "Les Huguenots," Meyerbeer), including part of the overture, the choral or hymn tune, "Ein Feste Burg," the carousal chorus, the cavatina, "Nobil Signor," and the stirring finale that accompanies the massacre of St. Barthomew's Day, the whole ably played by Dr. Spark. The same programme was repeated on Tuesday afternoon. The Piper of Hamelin," music by V. E. Nesler, was performed for the first time in Leeds at the Grand Theatre, on Monday evening. The principal artists were Madame Blanche Cole, Miss Lucy Franklein, Miss Clara Leslie; Messrs. Jas. Sauvage, and Albert McGuckin. The opera was well received.

German opera under Herr Richter, will, it seems, be really a welcome feature of the musical arrangements in London for next spring.

BLACKBURN.

On Nov. 7th, a somewhat unusual service was held at St. Peter's Church, when an oratorio entitled "Philippi," composed by Dr. Gladstone, was rendered by an augmented choir, consisting of, in addition to the choir of the church, ladies and gentlemen of local musical standing in the town. It remains now only to state that the work was performed to the satisfaction of the congregation assembled. Dr. Gladstone conducted, and Mr. George Mellor, the organist of the church, presided at the organ. After short evensong, the vicar, the Rev. Mr. Hignett, introduced the oratorio, and gave a most succinct and practical analysis of the work, concluding with the words that if the matter was received in a proper light it would be more beneficial than any sermon he or any minister could preach to them. Dr. Gladstone remarked at the conclusion of the service, that the performance had given him great satisfaction, and particularised the choruses, "In that was manifested" and "Now unto God," the former as showing pathetic rendering and the latter as a well and firmly executed chorus, and has since by letter thanked both organist and choir for their able rendering of the work.

On Nov. 5th, the Blackburn Choral and Orchestral Union performed W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," in the Exchange Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Madme. Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson. Herr Karl Meyder was the leader of the band, which was chiefly composed of local musicians, Mr. T. S. Hayward accompanist, and Mr. George Mellor, conductor. The band and chorus, numbering upwards of 200 performers, went through their part of "May Queen," with the exception of one or two little hitches, very creditably. The chorus showed throughout a readiness of "attack," Mr. Mellor having them, as usual, well in hand, and they sang for the most part with precision and vigour. In Mr. Hollins' first song it was evident that he was suffering from hoarseness, but the following duet with Miss Marriott elicited deserved applause. Mr. Bridson was successful in the song "Tis jolly to hunt," which, it need hardly be said, was well received. Madme. Enriquez had little to do in this part of the programme, but what she did was done exceedingly well. The "Stabat Mater" formed the second part of the programme. For his fine rendering of "Cujus animam" Mr. Hollins was loudly applauded. A furore was created by the duet "Quis est homo," by Miss Marriott and Madme. Enriquez. It was the great success of the evening. Mr. Bridson was also enthusiastically applauded for his "Pro peccatis." The recitative and chorus, "Eia, mater," was not, however, sung without accompaniment, as, according to the programme it should have been. Madme. Enriquez's "Fac ut portem," and Miss Marriott's "Inflammatus," were sung in first-class style, and were duly appreciated by the audience. The last chorus was a trying ordeal for both band and chorus, but they proved themselves equal to it in every respect. Mr. Mellor as conductor has an aptitude for work of this kind; his energy is inspiring, and he has a most skilful co-worker in Mr. T. S. Hayward as accompanist. The Blackburn Choral and Orchestral Society more than justifies its claim to support by such a performance as that of Monday night.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The Dublin Chamber Music Union inaugurated its ninth season on the 10th inst. with its customary concert at "The Antients." The hall was well filled with an eager and attentive audience, who at the conclusion of the entertainment went away quite satisfied with the fare which had been provided for them. Could they consistently have been otherwise, I ask, with such a programme as the following, and such veteran executants as Mons. A. Billet (piano), Herr Lauer (violin), and Herr Elsner (violoncello)?—

Trio in C, Op. 87 (first time), Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello. Allegro—Andante con moto—Scherzo, presto—Finale: Allegro giocoso.	Brahms.
Variations in D, Op. 17, Pianoforte and Violoncello	Mendelssohn.
"Il Trillo del Diavolo," Violin, with Pianoforte accompaniment	Tartini.
Prelude and Fugue, Alla Tarantella, Pianoforte alone	Bach.
Trio, C minor, Op. 1, No. 3, Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello. Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con variazioni—Menuetto, quasi Allegro—Finale: prestissimo.	Beethoven.

The opening trio (by Brahms) was new to a Dublin audience, this being the first time it has been performed here in public. At the hands of the distinguished artists named it received a most scholarly interpretation, and was very warmly applauded. The variations in D, Op. 17, for piano and 'cello (by Mendelssohn), were faultlessly given. To Herr Lauer's execution of the third item in the programme I must give unqualified praise. Mons. Billet got through the very difficult piano piece (by Bach) with his accustomed ease and gracefulness, and afforded much pleasure to his audience. The trio (by Beethoven), which brought the concert to a conclusion, was admirably played throughout. The next concert of the society is arranged for the 24th inst.

The St. Patrick Oratorio Society opens this season on the 16th inst., with "The Messiah." T. J. B.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Our present musical season could not be better inaugurated than with the first of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestral concerts, which took place in the Town Hall, on Nov. 12th, before an enthusiastic audience. There cannot be two opinions about the real service these concerts have done, and will do in the future, in strengthening the refined musical taste in our midst; by the excellency of the band, the magnificent pianoforte playing of the eminent conductor, and the finished and artistic rendering of the pieces, they have been hitherto unsurpassed in their way by any musical entertainment in our city. We have had many excellent concerts, so far as choral singing, but the want of orchestral concerts of late, at which important works of great composers would be performed, has been much felt, and when Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall, the energetic promoters of the Hallé concerts, announced their new scheme last year, the music-loving public in Newcastle and its neighbourhood hastened to give the enterprising gentlemen such liberal support that they have apparently been able to make these orchestral concerts a permanent institution in Newcastle—a matter of congratulation to every lover of the musical art.

The following formed the programme of the first concert:—

Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber.
Aria, "Nasce al Bosco" ("Ezio")	Handel.
Serenade and Allegro Giojoso (for pianoforte and orchestra)	Mendelssohn.
Air, "Ah che Querti Avventurieri"	Mozart.
Symphony Pastorale, No. 6	Beethoven.
Rhapsodie Norwegienne, No. 3, in C	Svendsen.

The orchestra, led by Herr Straus, played their parts not only with great spirit and power, but at the same time with a delicacy and due observance of light and shade. At the close of the splendid rendering of the "Pastoral" Symphony, the hall rang with applause from the delighted audience. Mr. Charles Hallé, who received quite an ovation when he first entered the hall to lead his band, played with his usual taste, first, Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Giojoso (Op. 43), played by the composer for the first time in public in the spring of 1838, at Madme. Botgorcheck's concert in Leipzig; and afterwards, the two pieces by Gluck. He was loudly encored, and as the audience would not take a refusal after his last solo, he gave as a substitute, Schubert's lovely Impromptu in A flat.

One of the novelties at this concert was the "Rhapsodie Norwegienne" (No. 3, in C), by the Norwegian composer, Johan S. Svensden (a scholar of Hauptmann and Reinecke, in Leipzig). This rhapsodie opens with a few fragmentary phrases, interrupted by the rude rusticity of some bare fifths (the latter a peculiarity belonging to the national Norwegian dances), before the composer introduces, as the motives, two characteristic "Spring dances," from Hallingdal; the two reels are charmingly treated, constantly intermingling with each other, until a lovely andante, a simple, tender folk-song (in G minor) interrupts these joyous strains. The work, which concludes with a finale of a graceful and sprightly character, gives a good idea of the songs and dances of the descendants of the hardy Norsemen.

Mr. Santley, the vocalist, a great favourite here, created quite a furore by his splendid singing, and, on being encored in Wagner's aria, he repeated a part of it.

Next week there is in store for us, Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," which will be performed at Mr. Rea's first subscription concert, on Nov. 21st. H. W.

DARTFORD.—Mr. Musgrove Tufnail (Medallist) Roy. Academy of Music, gave his first benefit concert on Wednesday, November 7th, at the Victoria Rooms. A large audience assembled, and thoroughly enjoyed an excellent programme of music, well performed by Mr. Tufnail and fellow students of the academy. A MS. trio, from "The Bride of Cambus" (W. G. Wood), was extremely well sung by Mdme. Wilson-Osman, Miss Rees, and Mr. Tufnail. Mr. Dyved Lewis, in a charming song, by Pinsuti, "Queen of the earth," gained great applause by his artistic singing. Mr. Tufnail was most successful in his songs, "Does my love know" (Ed. Hutton), and the celebrated "Torreador's song," from Bizet's "Carmen." Miss Rees and Miss Jones rendered efficient aid. Mr. Alfred Izard and Mr. Wiggins were able accompanists.

Says the Athenæum, Dr. C. Villiers Stanford's opera "Savonarola" is announced to be produced in January next at the Hamburg Opera, under the direction of Herr Sucher. The same composer's Serenade, written for last year's Birmingham Festival, is to be given in December and January at the Crystal Palace, Glasgow, and Edinburgh; also at the Vienna Philharmonic concerts under Herr Richter; at Berlin under Herr Joachim; and at New York under Theodore Thomas.

LEAMINGTON.

REV. E. HUSBAND ON "MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT."

A festival of choirs was recently held at the Parish Church. The choirs taking part were those of the Parish Church, Holy Trinity, and St. John's, Leamington; St. Mary's and St. Nicholas', Warwick; Whitnash, Milverton, and King's Middle School, Warwick; together with the members of the Leamington and Warwick Musical Societies, the choirs numbering altogether about 220 voices. Mr. Frank Spinney presided at the organ with his usual ability. The choirs were led by cornets, which raised the effect considerably. "Praise the Lord, O my soul" (Psalm ciii. 1-4, 13), by F. Spinney, was the anthem, and was most expressively sung. Master Whymack, a member of the Parish Church choir, took the treble solo, "Yea, like as a father pitieth his own children," very nicely, and the anthem was concluded with the Doxology in unison, sung slowly, with beautiful effect. An able and appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. E. Husband, "On Musical Development," from the text, "Let us go up unto perfection" (Heb. vi., 1). The Preacher said:—

These words enshrine a great principle of divine truth. They are but one of the many voices speaking from the Bible, telling us the method of God's dealing with the world. From out these words comes the solemn, stately music of Creation's processional hymn, marching ever onward along a scale of development, from lower to higher things, and from a state of imperfection to that great future of perfection, which our Poet Laureate calls "The Golden Year," when "all men's good" shall be "each man's rule." I think that if there is one truth before another manifestly plain in the world, it is this, that growth and development are the order of God's creations. Every created thing that is divine, seems engaged in a stately, solemn procession, moving on "unto perfection." As to the divine art of music, it is a long way to go back across the by-gone train of grey centuries, to the time before the Flood, when as we read in the 4th chapter of Genesis, "Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ." It is beside my purpose to-night, even if I had the time, to enter into any argument as to what kind of musical instruments Jubal's "harp and organ" may have been. All I want to show to-night is, that whatever they may have been, they were doubtless very rough, and as we should term them, unmusical instruments. One of the most beautiful melodies that Handel ever wrote he has set to the words which run thus:—"Oh! had I Jubal's lyre, to sounds like his I would aspire." I love the music of that song, but I cannot say I agree to the words. I think that if Jubal's music could be reproduced in these educated days, we should judge it as hardly fit for anything but a Salvation Army band. But Jubal's music was not unbeauteous in his almost barbaric age. I have no doubt that his mother Adah said, how beautiful it was, it "struck her into amazement. O wonderful son, that can so astonish a mother!" We live by comparisons and by the education of the times in which our lot is cast, and what would be but jarring, boisterous sounds of discord to us, were harmonies most sweet to an uneducated world before the days of the Deluge. They say that Palestine is the only land where there is no such thing as progress; where everything is at a standstill; no improvements, no growth with the spirit of the times; and if you have listened, as I have done, to the chanting at one of the Greek services in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, it must indeed strike us at once how terrible and unmusical the so-called music of by-gone ages must have been. It would be impossible to find words to describe the horrible sounds which the people at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre dare to call by the divine name of music. I don't suppose for one moment that to our modern ears in these cultivated days, the music used in Solomon's Temple would be called beautiful. I know that in the second Book of the Chronicles we read of the trumpeters and singers, the cymbals and other instruments of music; and I have not the least doubt but that the great congregation bowing before the altar were thrilled at what they felt to be the beauty and the dignity of the music. But could the old Temple choir be reproduced in our temple to-day, I think its chief effect would be to thin the congregation. It was grand music for Solomon's day, but the world has been developing in knowledge, and education, and beauty since then, and the little child, so to speak, has grown up to become the strong man. Art needs time for education, just like a child at school. Age brings cultivation. For example, America is, comparatively speaking, a newly-discovered country, and as yet she has produced no musical composer who can take rank as a "master" in the company of great composers. And why is this? She is too young a nation in the civilized world to be able as yet to produce that which the development of age alone can bring. Now pass on for a moment to another stage in our argument. Pass on to the fourth century, when St. Ambrose, one of the great fathers of the Western Church, lived. You all know that St. Ambrose, in his day, was a musical light in the darkness. A species of choral music was introduced by St. Ambrose, and we are all familiar with the Ambrosian chant. And these Ambrosian modes of the fourth century developed (I think I may rightly say) into the Gregorian chant of the sixth century, I suppose an improvement which Gregory the Great made on the work of St. Ambrose. I can imagine how thankful the men of Gregory's or St. Ambrose's day must have been for these great developments in music. I think St. Ambrose or St. Gregory must have been to the men of those days what Handel and Beethoven are to us now. In those early days of the fourth or sixth centuries the world, imperfect in its education, could not produce anything in music better than a Gregorian Tone. How is it that those early centuries have never produced a Handel, or a Mendelssohn; a Mozart, or a Beethoven? Simply because the world had not sufficiently advanced in its progress of development to make it possible to produce such as these. Had such as one of these appeared, he would have been living out of his time. He would not have been appreciated. He would have been beyond the men of his day, and would have been above their comprehension. But the crude simplicity of the Gregorian Tones were what the men of those days could appreciate. To them it was an advance in the scale of musical development, and they welcomed them with delight. I frankly confess that in these far off days I am no admirer of Gregorian music, much less of that modern custom in vogue with some of "Anglicanizing" Gregorian chants, the melody being Gregorian, but the harmony, often in four parts, being Anglican, entirely antagonistic to the unison rendering of pure Gregorian music. And it is a mystery to me how musical persons can say they admire the crude tones of Gregorian music. Of course I can admire such melodious exceptions as the "Tonus Peregrinus," which you have sung this evening, especially when sung so well, and by such a body of fine voices as those to-night. But I am speaking of the rule, not the exception, and it always seems to me as if Gregorian music, as a whole, was—to use an illustration—as if I wished to substitute for the improved harp of our own age, beautiful in tone, in construction, and in compass, the rough and clumsy "harp," or kinnor of Jubal's day. But of the Gregorian Tones, especially to the unmusical, I admit their vitality, for they are cherished by many, even in this far off nineteenth century. But I am sure it is their antiquity that is the real secret that enlists sympathy for them, and their connection with the ancient Church which makes them attractive to a certain section of earnest Churchmen. I know the emotion. It comes across me whenever I stand gazing upon some romantic ruin, the scene of some great historic event of bygone days. And now the world was getting ripe for some of those great musicians whose work in the realm of art will last for all time. I only speak to-night of those who have left us, not of those who are still with us, and enriching the music with their music still. But I have mentioned names enough to show that in these later days a great development has taken place. So sublime are some of these composers' works that it seems at first hard to imagine that music could higher go. Is it possible that musical development is still going on—going on unto perfection? I noticed that, so far as I could ascertain, the late talented organist of St. Paul's Cathedral never published a musical setting to the Communion service. There are many services of his to Matins and Evensong, but not for the higher service of Holy Communion. I suppose it was because there was no demand for them. But you will see that his successor, the present gifted organist, never publishes a morning service without including the music for the office of Holy Communion. The development of time has brought the demand, and of course the demand has been met. And so we move on and on. And, to speak for a moment of this Church, you, by your beautiful service to-night, which you have kindly given me the opportunity of enjoying, are helping forward the progress of music. First you render this service for the glory of God, but, by it, you are also helping to extend the divine art and appreciation of music. To do this is to do God's will, and to extend His truth; for music often preaches a more powerful sermon than you hear from the pulpit. I have never yet heard a sermon, speaking for myself, that has risen so high in eloquence, or in heart-melting appeal, as Handel's "Messiah," or Bach's music of the "Passion." And you, by your beautiful service to-night, have taken your part in the endeavour to improve Church music. I have been briefly, and in a fragmentary way, endeavouring to-night to trace the solemn, onward march of music in the history of development. I have referred to a goal of perfection which, as I believe, lies before the Art of Music, towards which she is moving, and to which it is her hope to attain. Where is that goal of perfection; when will it be reached? With all the light that shines upon this world, with its deeds of harmonious kindness and melodious love, still it is as yet an imperfect world, and we cannot hope to find the goal of perfection at present. I think for that perfection we must look up—along

> The world's great altar stairs,
> That slope through darkness up to God—

up to that bright home in Heaven, where the voice is "as the voice of many waters," singing the "new song before the Throne," and where is heard "the voice of harpers harping with their harps."

Throughout the country, in America, and abroad in certain parts, the increase in the number of organ recitals is very striking from year to year; and the present season shows equal, if not greater activity in this same direction.

A LUTHERAN TUNE.

THE separate publication of the favourite hymn with its traditional tune, "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott" at the time of the LUTHER commemoration was natural, but it might have been hoped that some pains would have been expended upon the securing of the most original form of the melody if that were possible. MEYERBEER, who notably employed what has been called the "war cry of Protestantism" in his "Huguenots," Prof. ELLA says had met with about ten different versions in different parts of Germany; and he appears to have been unable to arrive at any historical decision as to the precedence of these differing copies of the tune, accepting merely that version he liked best and found to be most popular. When charged by a well-known critic with tampering with the original,

Meyerbeer, Prof. Ella tells, sent the several versions to the critic, aforesaid, asking him to say which was the original one, but the critic was unable to answer the knotty question. The rendering chosen by no less an authority than MENDELSSOHN, and accepted for use in his so-called "Reformation" Symphony, has the characteristic absence of certain passing notes, as in the initial strain. It is well, though, to bear in mind that the absence of connecting notes, and the presence of disjunct intervals in what might be thought to be the simpler and consequently truer version of a traditional tune, by no means point to a safe conclusion that such a version was the original one. The practice in plain-song just prior to LUTHER's day, and the use in the plain-chant he must have been familiar with, at least in his younger days, of numerous connecting notes partly employed to secure conjunct intervals as forming the best melodic types, would rather induce the idea of the presence of what we in harmonic days call passing notes in any original melody LUTHER may have accepted. Two processes have been in action in this matter. When note against note harmony began to characterise the setting of chorals and hymn-tunes, melodies, as was the case to a large extent in the Roman Church—were denuded of what was thought to be superfluous melodic activity, as interfering with the more solid, newly acquired progressions in strong, simple harmony. When the strong contrapuntal impulse in Italy and Germany at the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, which culminated in the works of the greatest of contrapuntists J. S. BACH, came about, the fashion of harmonising upon contrapuntal lines was to a large extent recovered, and the growing taste for simpler and severer methods of harmonising congregational tunes received a decided check. So in the eighteenth Century more ornate and flowing tunes became the fashion—especially in England, where the traditional connection between hymns and tunes had never been rigorously maintained—to an extent which led to an abuse, ending in the constant use of out of place and needless ornamentation in Church Psalmody. This tendency led to some extent to the restoration of, and in some cases the re-adornment of, melodic figures as in use in the later and ornate days of plain song. So the fluctuations which have taken place in these diverse directions make it almost impossible to decide as to original tune forms, save on the strength of a comparison of copies and the securing of reliable data in the possession of books of the earliest available printed dates. Dr. E. J. HOPKINS assigns the date of the tune of "Ein' feste Burg" to the year 1529. The date given by the painstaking musical editor should perhaps be a few years earlier. LUTHER first published in 1522 eight of his hymns; in 1527 he enlarged his collection to sixty-three; and in 1543 he had increased it to 125. The real origin of this, as of many other traditional tunes, may perhaps never be safely fixed. Although the odium theologicum reigned in its bitterest forms in LUTHER's day, music was to a large extent a beneficent common possession; and LUTHER himself was an ardent admirer of the great composers of the Roman Church of his own and preceding times. So it may be the tune in question dates back into the days when Latin hymns with their accepted plain-song melodies prevailed. On the other hand, the determined independence of the Reformers even struck at the too general acceptance of melodies handed down through the Roman Church, and a strong impulse to the composition of a new school of specially composed Protestant music was given to the musicians in Germany, France, and England. And it may readily be conceived that so notable a hymn as "Ein' feste Burg" proved to be, would not only command an original tune, but that no melodies bearing Roman traditions and associations would have been found acceptable to the fiercely-in-earnest band of Reformers. It would be most unlikely that any tune of secular origin should ever have been associated with any of the Lutheran hymns, as was said to be the case in the first thirty or so of the metrical Psalms of CLEMENT MAROT; who, according to good authority, seized upon certain fashionable secular tunes for the purpose of helping to popularise his version of the Psalms. The German Reformers were of a sterner sort than CLEMENT MAROT. Dr. BURNEY and other authorities plainly assert that LUTHER wrote the hymn, set it to music, and sang it as he entered Worms in 1521. It is not improbable, however, that the musician HENRY, of Gottingen, who rendered LUTHER much good service in arranging and composing music for his hymns and liturgical offices, had a hand in composing or adapting the famous tune now being considered; which BURNEY gives without the passing notes in the first strain and repetitions, just as it is employed by MENDELSSOHN in his "Reformation" Symphony, "and just indeed as it "was printed in LUTHER's own time in copies "still preserved." Another composer who might very probably be concerned in the formation of this tune, was JOHANN WALTHER, a man highly esteemed by LUTHER. It has been asserted positively that LUTHER composed the tune of "Ein feste Burg," one chief evidence for this assertion being that LUTHER left a copy in his own handwriting of the date 1530 when at Coburg. The fact of making a copy says little or nothing, however, and there are instances numerous enough of compositions being assigned to prominent men, not the real composers, who have become identified with such pieces in some way or other. It is a pity for musical reasons that the various versions of the famous old tune were not collected and then printed together upon the occasion of the present commemoration.

MUSIC AT CITY DINNERS.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON'S annual feast on the 9th November suggests a timely reference to civic banquets in general, on the musical, not the gastronomical, side of the question. It would be ungracious not to acknowledge the pleasure derivable from entertainments at the splendid halls of the Goldsmiths, the Fishmongers, and the Merchant Taylors.

The City Companies always provide vocal music after their dinners, and eminent artists are often engaged to sing. That genial companion, THOMAS

Digitized by Google

FRANCIS, Vicar Choral of St. Paul's Cathedral, used to "lead" a goodly company at the old London Tavern, or rather to take the alto parts, whilst he directed as general Superintendent. At the City Companies' banquets, money is no object, so that vocalists of standing, like FRANCIS, and eminent members of Musical Societies, always found a footing and were welcomed like the rest of the gentlemen guests. FRANCIS would tolerate no liberties; he once stopped his choir, in full career, because a rude waiter crossed the path during the particular quartet. The example might be followed at St. James's Hall and the Crystal Palace, where, by the way, the edict to prohibit entrance during the performance has just been repealed.

The recent programmes of two City Companies, the CLOTHWORKERS and the SADDLERS, lie on the table. The first contains a short, but interesting account of the "Loving Cup" and its origin. For the after-dinner music: the "Grace" is an English version of the "Laudi Spirituali," A.D. 1545, a Part-song in F, with some bold harmonic progressions; the National Anthem follows. The miscellaneous music includes part-songs by KUCKEN, REICHHARDT, and Sir HENRY BISHOP; the last of these, the pretty sestet, "Stay, prythee, stay," from "The Miller and his "Men," last heard by the writer at old Covent Garden Theatre in April, 1835, with Mr. BRINDAL, a "walking gentleman" as Count Friburg, and Drink-water Meadows—as Karl. The famous Round, "When "the wind blows" heralded BISHOP'S fame over the continent. To return to our schemes: Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, deservedly a favourite contralto in the chamber, sang "The Minstrel Boy," and Molloy's "London Bridge." ALICE MARY SMITH'S "Maying" duet, was sung by Mrs. WORRELL and Mr. PLATTER.

At the SADDLERS' dinner (on Oct. 23rd), may be noticed, out of the medley, Sir H. BISHOP'S air, "Tell me, my heart" CHARLES HORN'S pretty cavatina, "Thro' the wood," where three verses are written in the tonic, the dominant, and the relative minor, and PURDAY'S old song (by request), "The "fine old English Gentleman." Miss ALICE FAIRMAN agreeably varied the scheme with an Italian air, "Il segreto," of DONIZETTI, and also sang an English piece by Mr. RANDEGGER.

These programmes might be much improved. Not one of the fine old glees or madrigals adorns the list. The modern "Part-Songs," good enough in their way, are crowding out the old sterling stuff. Who ever hears now-a-days, at public dinners, the madrigal, "When first I saw thy face," or that exquisite Italian one, "My pretty love was playing." JOHN BARNETT'S Trio in G, "This magic-wove scarf" comes out occasionally, like a glowworm in July, to disappear for a season. "Catches," again, so clever and comical, are rarely heard now, such as "Mr. Speaker, though 'tis late," "How Sophia," and the like. And here I am reminded of the great benefit that the body, as well as the mind, may derive from a performance of light orchestral music, as in the QUEEN'S palaces, during the repast. This is done at St. James's Hall, where the band play overtures, waltzes, and pretty dance music in a gallery over the large dining-room.

I lately stood in the corridor, on the first "Popular" Concert night, to hear a favourite overture of AUBER, to his opera, "Haydée" (1848), where a delicious nautical chorus in triple time is introduced as a second subject, and spiced with the saucy skip of a diminished fifth in descent, from G to C sharp, in the key of C major.

TIMELY ACTION.

THOUGH it may be true that "La vérité n'est pas tou-"jours bonne à dire," there are certainly times when plain outspoken words must be said. Such an opportunity comes to hand in the statement that the "General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal "Church in America has completed its revision of "the Prayer Book; and that the new rubrics, so "revised, provide for a very large discretion on the "part of officiating ministers, in regard both to the "selection of alternative canticles, prayers, and "lessons, and to the abbreviation of the several "Services."

It was natural that this timely action should first take place away from these shores, but there are many signs that the time is at hand when the serious attention of all concerned must here be devoted to the same subject. At present, the prevailing hurry through the Service and Service music, is simply disgraceful; and the natural irreverence is intensified by the knowledge that such indecent haste is encouraged in order that more time may be secured for the generally out of place lecture-sermon. When shall we hear our Services, after being duly put in order and revised, rendered with becoming gravity and consequent earnestness? When shall we have our ostentatious and indecently prolonged sermons properly limited, both as regards the topics treated upon and time occupied in sermon delivery? When again, shall we have in public worship a full supply of food with time to digest it in, and a proper administering of medicine? because pulpit rhetoric should be infinitesimal in its doses; praise and prayer are spiritual food in their way, and preaching is ecclesiastical medicine; necessary at times but hurtful when of untimely use. When we have had the honesty and courage to set about these much called for reforms, then a better development of public worship will truly begin in earnest. Then there will be real hope of the full development of Christian art, and Church music will take her real place in our midst. Music as the purest of the arts, and above all as an ordained means of praise, stands in the scheme of Christian arts in a position corresponding with that occupied by Charity in the list of Christian virtues. Just as faith will be swallowed up in realisation, and hope be lost in enjoyment, and love will still remain, so also preaching will be lost when the Church shall reach her home, and ministerial offices done away in the gloriously completed work of redemption, and music will still live on in everlasting praise. Let us, therefore, strive to place Church music in its true high place even here on earth. And to this end and to the general strengthening of the Church, it is high time to revise, adorn, abbreviate where necessary, and in every way to improve our Church Service, forms, and acts of public worship.

Organ News.

ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH, WESTMINSTER.

On the occasion of the opening of a fine new organ, Dr. Bridge's oratorio, "Mount Moriah," was performed on Wednesday evening, November 14th, with orchestral accompaniment, and a large body of voices. The work itself is now so well known that it will suffice to say that the whole was excellently rendered, the solo parts being sustained by the choristers of the Abbey, and Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Edward Dalzell. Dr. Bridge himself presided at the organ, and after the Service played Handel's second organ concerto, also with orchestral accompaniment. This novelty appeared to attract much attention from the very large congregation assembled.

Messrs. Hill and Son were entrusted with the entire rebuilding and enlargement of the organ in the above-named Church. A fine new case of oak has also been fitted to it, in the style of the fifteenth century gothic, and of somewhat foreign treatment. It was designed by Mr. Arthur G. Hill, M.A., F.S.A. The large front, with sixteen-feet spotted metal pipes (some of which are embossed after the mediæval fashion), faces W. down the N. aisle, and the smaller front looks into the Choir through the easternmost arch. Subjoined is the specification :—

LEWISHAM HIGH ROAD CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

A large congregation attended at the above Church on Thursday last, on the occasion of the re-opening of the organ, after extensive alterations, by Messrs. Hill and Son, involving an outlay of some £300. The organ has three manuals and pedal. General satisfaction was expressed at the appearance and tone of the fine instrument, also at the good selection of music played by the organist, Mr. Byrom, consisting of Bach's "St. Ann's Fugue," overture in C (Mendelssohn); two andantes by Smart and Batiste, and an adagio and finale from a quartet by Spohr. Specially to be noticed was the admirable rendering of the fine fugue and overture (played from memory). The church is to be congratulated on having the valuable aid of so experienced and able an organist. The choir (under the direction of Mr. E. Miles), sang Hopkins' "Te Deum in G," Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land" (the effect was marred, however, by the solo being sung "tutti," contrary to the composer's directions), the first chorus, from the "Lobgesang," and Handel's "Hallelujah"; the two latter choruses were excellently rendered. Miss Jessie Griffin contributed "Hear, ye Israel," Costa's "I will extol Thee," and Handel's "O had I Jubal's lyre." The young lady's performance gave much pleasure, the last song, however, suiting her best.

The organ exhibited by Henry Jones and Sons, of Fulham Road, in the International Fisheries Exhibition, which has been much admired during the past season, has been sold to the Roman Catholic Cathedral, at Portsmouth. The same firm, it is stated, have received a commission from the Royal College of Music to erect a second organ in the Royal Albert Hall, for the use of the pupils.

Academical Intelligence.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A lecture on the "History and Construction of the Pianoforte" by Mr. A. J. Hipkins was delivered to the pupils of the Royal College of Music on Nov. 6th, in the west theatre of the Royal Albert Hall. The lecture was illustrated by large diagrams and by specimens of the clavichord, spinet, harpsichord, early square piano (1780), and short iron grand piano of the present day, contributed by Messrs. Broadwood, Mr. Herbert Bowman, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Dale, and Mr. Hipkins. It was full of interest and instruction, and was evidently enjoyed by the students. As the progressive forms of the instrument came under consideration, Mr. Hipkins illustrated his statements by performance on each. Mr. Hipkins is not only a master of his subject, but he knows how to fully engage his listeners' attention in a history which is of rare interest, and contains not a little of the romance of the art.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Mr. A. Goring Thomas's opera "Esmeralda" was produced in Cologne on Wednesday last, and met with an enthusiastic reception, the composer being called forward twice at the end of each act. The work was admirably performed and mounted. Mr. Thomas cordially thanked the conductor, Herr Muehldorfer, the singers and players, for their excellent rendering.

There is to be a grand concert on the 18th at Lille, in honour of Delibes.

Organ recitals are to be given shortly in Brussels by MM. Mailly and Wiegand.

Marschner's "The Templar and the Jewess" has been proposed for revival at Vienna.

An excellent orchestral concert was given at Basle on Nov. 4th, including music by Mendelssohn, Wagner, Volkmann, &c.

M. Franz Servaise has completed the score of his dramatic work "L'Apollonide." Presently it will be given at a Brussels concert.

Tito Ricordi, the well-known Italian music-publisher, was 73 years of age on the 29th ult.

At a recent concert given by the Liederkranz, Heidelberg, the principal item in the programme was Wagner's biblical scene, "Das Libesmahl der Apostel."

M. Jacques Léopold Heugel, the able and learned editor of Le Ménéstrel, died, much regretted by a large circle of friends, on Nov. 12th, at the age of 68.

The Choral Society, Auckland, New Zealand, recently gave a performance of Schumann's "Paradies und Peri." For their next concert they announce Haydn's "Creation."

A symphonic poem by Steinbach ("The Birth of Venus") and a so-called "Gothic Symphony" by B. Godard, is said to have been given at Mainz, under Dr. von Bülow's direction.

The Russian author, Ivan Tourgeneff, who died in the house of Mdme. Viardot, has left all his property to that lady by the following will :—"I make Mdme. Pauline Viardot my universal legatee.—IVAN TOURGENEFF."

Le Ménéstrel states that Herr Pollini has offered Anton Rubinstein the sum of 500,000 marks (£25,000) for a tour of one hundred concerts in America, and adds that the popular pianist has not yet given his decision.

The Parisian organist Arthur James Leavy, for some time of the church of Saint Germain-en-Laye, died on Oct. 31st, aged 38. He was a pupil of Clapisson and composed some effective Church and organ music.

The revival of Johann Adolf Hasse's one-act opera "Hercules am Scheidewege" at Dresden is a curious proposal not without interest, the work finding favour a hundred and twenty years ago.

Lately "Carmen" has been revived at the Opéra Comique, Paris. The part of the heroine has been pronounced as one of the most remarkable impersonations of Mdme. Galli-Marié.

The popular Théâtre du Château d'Eau, Paris, opened recently for the season, under the direction of M. de Lagrené. Mermet's opera "Roland à Roncevaux," first produced at Paris in 1864, was revived upon this occasion.

The death of the able Belgian composer, François-Marie Demol, occurred at Ostend, on Nov. 3rd. Demol was born at Brussels, on March 3rd, 1844, and was under 40 therefore. His opera, "Le Chanteur de Médine," was successfully brought out two years and a half ago. He was a good organist, able conductor, and skilful all-round musician.

The 4th of Nov. being the anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, a performance of much interest was given in the theatre, Leipzig, consisting of a selection of the works of the composer, and including the "Son and Stranger," the "First Walpurgis Night," placed on the stage as a dramatic work, and the splendid finale to "Loreley."

Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio, "King David," had its first hearing in London last night, Nov. 16th, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society. Sir A. S. Sullivan conducted upon this occasion. A notice will be given next week.

Correspondence.

THE MEMORIAL TO SIR JOHN GOSS.

A SUGGESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—It is gratifying to find so much zeal and kindly feeling existing amongst professional musicians, who are now anxious to do honour to the memory of the late organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.

It appears to be the custom in these days to reserve or preserve all our kindly feelings and our homage until the subject of our admiration is buried and out of sight—where they cease to be moved by what the world might say or do.

Sir John Goss had, no doubt, during life, many genial friends and admirers, but I very much question that any one ever thought of speaking or writing so glowingly to his honour as they do now, now that he is removed from us. How gratified the dear old man would have felt in his declining years, how the colour would have risen to his pallid cheeks with pleasurable emotion, could he have imagined that his efforts would or could have been so much appreciated.

I should be sorry to say anything at all calculated to damp the ardour or discourage the efforts of those who are wishful to contribute to the proposed memorial. Yet, I do consider that our kindly feelings and our homage should be given unreservedly to those who distinguish themselves and yet are spared to us, so that they may see, hear, and feel the full force of the hearty approval in which they are held.

The authorities of St. Paul's—indeed, all our cathedrals and clergy—should combine (unsolicited) to erect a memorial to the memory of one who served them so faithfully for thirty-four years. Sir John Goss (like all other Church composers) was not enriched by dedicating his talents as a composer to its services. No; but the Church has been greatly enriched by his efforts—therefore, it is only right and seemly that the Church who have been so faithfully served should, to show to posterity their gratitude and appreciation, erect, without delay, a monument worthy of the man we venerate.

I am, yours truly,

THOS. HOPKINSON.

MENDELSSOHN AND MOSCHELES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I have been much interested in reading "An Old Reporter's Reminiscences" in the Musical Standard and the story of "Mendelssohn keeping the Band waiting."

When a student at the Leipzig Conservatorium in 1857, I well recollect spending one very delightful evening at the house of my dear old master Moscheles, in the Dresdener Strasse, and meeting there, with others, the celebrated violinist Laub, who played during the evening with Moscheles magnificently several of Beethoven's pianoforte and violin sonatas, I, having the honour to act, by request, as "turnover."

Moscheles had in his possession many remarkable musical curiosities, and showed us several funny scrap-books, MSS. letters of Mendelssohn and others, and among other anecdotes told, I remember Moscheles relating—to illustrate the amiable disposition of Mendelssohn—how they were once together in Cramer's music-shop in Regent Street, when Mendelssohn became so interested in something as to forget the rehearsal which he had to direct until reminded of the time by Moscheles. Their arrival was late, and a member of the band pertly enquired, "if the Conductor's watch went backwards." Mendelssohn was hurt, and the Directors, according to Moscheles, wished to dismiss the offending musician, but Mendelssohn would not hear of or consent to this, and at his earnest request the indiscretion was passed over and the offender retained his position in the orchestra.

In haste, yours &c.,

EDWARD LAWRANCE.

Nov. 8th, 1883.

The South London Musical Club gave an enjoyable private musical evening on Nov. 13th, under the direction of Mr. Charles Stevens.

The Birmingham Post hears from a trustworthy source that M. Gounod has made great progress with his oratorio "Mors et Vita," which he is writing for the next Birmingham Festival. A recent visitor, who has had the privilege of hearing some portions of the work, is of opinion that it will be placed at the head of M. Gounod's compositions, and the composer himself is convinced that it will take rank in advance even of "The Redemption." The work will doubtless be awaited with enthusiastic expectation.

Passing Events.

The second of a series of smoking concerts at the Horns, Kennington, will be given under the direction of Mr. G. F. Grover, on the 21st.

"The Reminiscences of an Old Reporter" will be resumed next week. The "Musical Union" will probably be the subject of the article.

It will be seen in our advertisement columns that Mr. Walter Parratt is to give an organ recital at the City Temple on the 22nd inst. Admission free.

Mr. A. Tamplin has been lecturing at the May Street Schools, West Kensington, on the "History, Construction, and Technicalities of the Pianoforte."

At the next members' meeting of the Central Music Studio, Herbert Street, N., on Nov. 22nd, the Principal (Mr. J. Bailey) will give a recital, "Stephen Heller: his Life and Works." Admission free by ticket, which may be had upon application to the Secretary.

Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley have again appeared at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts. Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 6, and Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture were included in the classical selection the other week.

The Liverpool Cathedral Choir, assisted by voices from the principal Church choirs of that city, will give a rendering of Spohr's oratorio, "The Last Judgment," at a special Service to be held in the Cathedral on the evening of the first Thursday in Advent, the 6th of December.

It is stated that a contract has been entered into between Mr. Ernest Gye and Herr Angelo Neumann, by which a series of twenty representations of German opera will be given at Covent Garden next spring. Mesdames Albani and Lucca will appear, and the cast will comprise the best German talent available.

It is announced that Mr. F. Pitman has considerably extended his premises by the addition of No. 21, Paternoster Row, which has been specially fitted up for the better accommodation of professional and retail customers; also by the addition of No. 44, Ivy Lane, to be used as a stock room.

It is announced that the Boston (U.S.) Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. George Henschel, commenced its present series of concerts on the 13th ult. Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony was the chief item in the programme. Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist, and made a most favourable impression.

There is something in the protest, endorsed by letters in the Evening Standard and Church Bells, against disturbing tunes firmly associated with given hymns. In France and elsewhere within the pale of the Roman Church, the people find certain tunes touchingly engraved upon their hearts by, one may say, centuries of undisturbed and endeared associations.

The announcement that the Dean and Chapter of Bristol have decided to discontinue the elaborate nave Services in their Cathedral, as the collections do not cover the expenses, gives rise to the natural question, Why do not our rich Cathedral bodies do more for the people without collections? There can be no excuse for cathedral meanness in England, surely.

Mr. W. C. Greaves, 6, Dyer's Buildings, Holborn, will be grateful for votes for Charles Alfred Buddock, for the December election at the Commercial Traveller's Schools, Pinner. The father of the child was an obliging non-professional organist, and composer of several hymn tunes, etc. He died in India a year ago, leaving a widow and six children unprovided for. The case is one deserving kind and prompt support.

The Blackheath chamber concerts given by Mr. Alfred Burnett and Mr. Ridley Prentice will consist of four subscription concerts at the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, on the same model as before, each programme to include three concerted works. The concerts will take place on Tuesday evenings:—Nov. 20th and Dec. 4th, 1883; Feb. 12th and March 4th, 1884. The artists engaged are of the first rank, and good music is promised.

A new Society has been formed, the "Brixton Philharmonic Society." The post of conductor will be occupied by Mr. Frederick Walker, and Mr. Alfred Izard will be the accompanist. This Society has a chorus of 100 voices, and includes many of the members of the Brixton Choral Society now out of harness through the much regretted illness of Mr. W. Lemare.

Under the auspices of the Lewisham Bicycle Club, a concert was given at Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, on Nov. 14th. The vocalists were: Miss Grace Woodward, Miss Margaret Hoare, R.A.M., Miss Beeman Hughes, Mr. John Henry, Mr. Arthur Thomas, and Mr. R. E. Miles; violin, Miss Marie Schumann; pianoforte, Miss Marian Pope, R.A.M., Miss Robinson, Mr. Hy. R. A. Robinson; accompanist, Mr. Hy. R. A. Robinson.

The Festival of the London Church Choir Association took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 8th instant. Mr. C. E. Miller's new Evening Service (Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in D) and Dr. Stainer's new Anthem, "And all the people saw the thunderings," both written for the festival, were sung in their respective places, and after the sermon the "Hallelujah" Chorus was given. Mr. Bird of Kensington Parish Church was the organist, and Mr. J. Murray was the conductor as usual.

THE VOICE

MUSICALLY AND MEDICALLY CONSIDERED.

BY

ARMAND SEMPLE, B.A., M.B., Cantab., M.R.C.P., Lond.

Physician to the Royal Society of Musicians.

ARTICULATION, OR "STROKE" OF THE GLOTTIS.

Preparation having been made, as already indicated, the breath should be drawn in slowly, and the sound emitted with a neat and firm articulation or "stroke" of the glottis upon the broad Italian A. (I shall have more to say concerning the incessant use of this vowel in succeeding pages.) If this movement is performed properly, a sound and bright tone will be produced. The note should not be slurred up to or felt for, but pitched upon or struck at once.

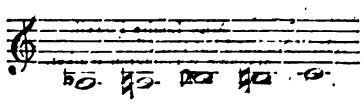
This stroke of the glottis must not be confounded with that of the chest, which is similar to the act of coughing, or clearing the throat, and which act, viz., coughing out the notes of the chest, costs much loss of breath, and produces an uncertain, aspirated, and stifled tone. It has been shown in earlier pages that the glottis is prepared for articulation by closing it, thus producing below it a momentary accumulation of air; and it is then opened by a sudden and vigorous stroke. Some teachers recommend the use of the syllables, Pa, La, Ma, and an old friend and former teacher of mine, Mr. Edwin West, used to advise the employment of the syllable Gla, in order to acquire precision in the striking of notes. Signor Garcia is opposed to this measure, since he is of opinion that thus the lips, tongue, and other organs, not concerned in the emission of the voice, are set in motion, and that it merely disguises the faulty articulation of the glottis, and has no power of correcting it; but I would respectfully submit, that many aspiring vocalists find (I did at one time myself) the greatest difficulty in keeping the tongue down in the mouth, and the syllable La, as I remember an Italian Master, a Signor Farini, always used, ensured the tongue being placed in its proper position before striking the note. Again, the syllable Gla not only places the tongue down, but favours the graceful recession of the mouth, so important in producing perfect vocal tone. Of course it is not necessary that the study should always be continued in this perhaps artificial manner; but I only venture to think that it acts as a good corrective under certain circumstances.

Extreme looseness of the lower jaw is of great importance, for the easy movement of the organs beneath it greatly depends upon the facility with which it moves, it falls by its own weight, and according to the ease with which the structure moves so is the sound rendered mellow and elastic.

CULTIVATION OF THE FEMALE VOICE.

The Chest Register.

In females the notes which should be first attempted, and which are in most cases the easiest to produce, are those of the chest. They are the following: viz., La (A) flat, La (A), Si (B) flat, Si (B), and Do (C).



If these are well managed, they will come out pure and ringing. They should be repeated several times successively, not held long. Ascent may then be made by semitones to Fa (F) and the descent by semitones as low as the voice allows. Starting from Re (D)

the higher the sounds rise, the more opened must the bottom of the throat be. The Italian A must be enunciated with the utmost clearness, taking care not to stretch the mouth too wide, by which means the sound will be made guttural. In some cases difficulty is found in producing the notes of the chest register on the Italian A; it is then a good plan to try the Italian I (Anglice E), since thus the lips of the glottis are more closely approximated. So important does my friend Mr. Henry Parker, a well-known pianist, composer and teacher of singing, think the employment of the Italian I, that in his work of the "Voice" he recommends the pupil to commence on this vowel, and gradually draw the A into it. If some sopranos would bear this advice in mind, they would probably lose much of the harsh quality that they possess in the higher notes. The lips of the glottis may be more nearly brought together, and the emission of the chest notes facilitated, by a vigorous slur from a sound already acquired to the one which presented a difficulty. Deep sounds should not be made too forcibly.

The foregoing statements concerning the chest register are applicable to all registers and to every variety of vocalisation.

"A SONG FOR OCTOBER."

By the late J. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

Fade not so soon, fair leaves,
Fall not so soon;
What though the autumn spider weaves
Her fairy webs, and the large harvest moon
No longer shines upon the yellow sheaves?
Fade not so soon!

Fade not so soon! the calm untroubled sky
Is fair with colour and is glad with light;
Still is the stubble golden, and the flight
Full of the summer's perfume. Why
Should ye that are so fair make haste to die?
Winter will linger yet,
Fade not so soon!

Linger a little, oh! remorseless Time!
If prayer could stay thee, or entreaty bind,
What worship would be thine!

THE RUSSIAN NATIONAL HYMN.

General Alexis Lvow, in his yet unpublished "Memoirs," thus relates the history of the Russian National Hymn, "God protect the Czar," first publicly performed fifty years ago on the 11th December at the Grand Theatre, Moscow:—

"In 1833 I accompanied the Emperor Nicholas to Prussia and Austria. On our return to Russia, I was informed by Count de Benkendorff that our Sovereign, regretting that we Russians had no National Hymn, and tired of the English air which had so long done duty for one, requested me to try and write such a composition. The problem struck me as extremely difficult and serious. Recollecting the imposing British hymn, 'God save the King,' the French hymn, so full of originality, and the Austrian Hymn, with its touching music, I felt and comprehended the necessity of producing something vigorous, grand, moving, and national, fit to be heard in a church by thousands of the army, or in the midst of a popular gathering, and within the reach of everyone, from the scholar to the person of no education at all. The thought absorbed me, the condition of the task I was charged to carry out perplexed me. One evening, on returning home very late, I composed and wrote down the melody of the hymn. The next day I called on Joukovsky to ask him for the words, but he was not a musician, and could not adapt them to the finale in the minor key of the first cadence of the melody. I informed Count de Benkendorff that the hymn was ready. The Emperor said he would hear it, and on the 23rd November, 1833, came, accompanied by the Empress and the Grand-Duke Michael, to the Chapel of the Imperial Choristers. I had summoned the whole body of the latter, and backed them up with two full bands. The Emperor had the hymn repeated several times; then sung it without accompaniment; and then performed by all the executants combined. He said to me in French, 'It is superb;' and then and there ordered Count de Bekendorff to inform the Minister of War that the hymn was adopted for the whole army. The decree was promulgated on the 4th December, 1833, and the hymn was heard publicly for the first time on the 11th December, 1833, at the Grand Theatre, Moscow. It seemed as if the Emperor wanted to see how the Moscow public liked my work. On the 25th December the hymn was heard in the Winter Palace at the ceremony of blessing the standards. The Emperor was pleased to present me with a gold snuff-box set with diamonds as a testimony of his satisfaction, and ordered, furthermore, that the words, 'God protect the Czar,' should be introduced in the armorial bearings of the Lvow family."—Musical World, U.S.

"KING DAVID."

ORATORIO BY SIR GEORGE A. MACFARREN.

The Sacred Harmonic Society exhibited commendable judgment in selecting this noble work as the subject of their opening concert of the new season, on Friday last, the 16th inst., at St. James's Hall. It may be interesting to give an outline of the action, which is as follows:—

The overture is descriptive of the shepherd life of David, the summons to battle, his singing before Saul, the king's envy and death. The first part of the oratorio treats of the rejoicings of the Israelites at the bringing in of the ark; David's sin with the wife of Uriah the Hittite; the prophet Nathan's denunciation, and David's repentance. The second part relates the murder of Amnon by his brother Absalom's command, the return of the latter and his rebellion against David, the young man's subsequent death, and the restoration of the kingdom.

The following account is a summary of the whole work:—The action starts with the death of Saul and proceeds not so much as a continuous recital, but as a succession of detached numbers, the words being taken from various books of Holy Writ such as the Psalms, Chronicles, Samuel, Isaiah, the Hebrews, Job, St. Matthew, and St. Luke. Thus at the commencement we have a chorus of the twelve tribes swearing allegiance to David with the words, "Behold, David, we are thy bone and thy flesh," and "Behold how good and joyful a thing it is." Then a recitative and song for King David (baritone), "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites," and "I will not suffer mine eyes to sleep." Then the Psalm for the bringing in of the ark. Then soprano solo "The faith of the just is as a shining light," and "Let our light so shine." Then the prophecy of Nathan (tenor) "Thus saith the Lord, I took thee from the sheepcote," leading to a chorus "His throne shall be for everlasting." Then song by David, "Who am I, O Lord God, that thou hast brought me hitherto." Then chorus "The seed of David is great." At this point follows a narration by the contralto descriptive of David's sin with Uriah's wife, followed by a chorus "Remember not, Lord, our offences." Now the parable by Nathan of the rich man taking the poor man's ewe lamb, followed by a duet for bass and tenor in which Nathan tells David he is the rich robber. Then a contralto solo "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul," the first part terminating with a chorus "Vengeance belongeth to the Lord."

The second part opens with a narration by contralto describing the death of Amnon by the command of Absalom, the grief of King David, the flight of Absalom, and the device of the woman of Tekoah, leading to a duet for soprano and baritone, in which the woman of Tekoah induces the king to restore Absalom. Here follows the rebellion of Absalom and a chorus "Absalom prepareth chariots and horses," and a recitative and song for tenor (Absalom), "O that I were judge in the land," and "My judgment shall be as a robe and a diadem." Then chorus of the spies of Absalom, "Give ear, all ye tribes of Israel, as soon as ye hear the sound of the trumpet then shall ye say Absalom reigneth in Hebron." Then song for contralto, "Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil," followed by a chorus of the faithful to David beseeching him to fly and make good his escape, and narration by contralto describing the retreat of David's army across the Jordan. Then a chorus by the faithful, "Thou O king shalt not go forth to battle," and recitative and song for David "What seemeth you best I will do, but O ye hundreds and thousands, deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom," and "Lord, where are Thy loving kindnesses." Here follows duet for soprano and contralto, "Like as a father pitieth his own children," and "How high the heaven is in comparison to the earth." Then dialogue by David seated between the two gates, and chorus of female voices descriptive of the events of the battle, terminating with a chorus of male voices announcing the victory and Absalom's death. Then song by David expressive of his grief, "Oh, Absalom, my son, my son, Absalom! would God I had died for thee." Then chorus with solo (baritone), "Behold, the king weepeth and mourneth for Absalom." Then song by soprano, "Despise not thou the chastening of the Lord," and chorus of people rejoicing for the delivery of Israel from the Philistines. Then a song by David, "Have mercy upon me, O God." Then chorus "Joy is in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth," and quartet "There shall be joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." The whole terminating with the Doxology.

The first part is shorter than the second, and hardly enlists the interest so much as the latter, since it embraces more ground and is in consequence somewhat fragmentary, the second part being confined entirely to the movements of the king and Absalom. The pathetic scene in which the father's racking anxiety for his son is depicted, is a masterpiece of dramatic realism, all thought of the civil war being lost in the cry, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" All that follows from this point is certainly superfluous and somewhat tiring, although the musical scoring is quite equal to what has preceded, and it would seem a wise proceeding to terminate the work here, bearing in mind that last Friday the work occupied close upon three hours and a half, including the interval between the parts. Sir G. A. Mafarren must be congratulated upon having given to British musical art a work which is throughout impressive, vigorous, admirably scored, endowed with great musical charm, and of thoroughly English tone.

The vocalists were the same as at the Leeds Festival, with the exception of Miss Anna Williams (in the place of Madme. Valleria), who undertook the part at a short notice. This lady sang the part as if she had been long familiar with it, and was specially successful in her rendering of "The path of the just." Madme. Patey sang delightfully throughout, and made a deep impression with "What is a man profited." Mr. Lloyd rendered his numbers with his usual care and refinement, his chief effort being "My judgment shall be as a robe." Mr. Santley invested the part of the king with great dignity, and sang the grief passages with the most exquisite tenderness. His impersonation of this character may well rank with his rendering of Elijah. The duet for the two ladies "Like as a father," was much appreciated. The chorus obtained a good share of applause, an encore for the fugal chorus with organ prelude "The seed of David is great," being so unanimous that it was repeated. The chorus "Remember not, Lord, our offences," and the "Vengeance Chorus" which closes the first part, also demand special notice. The overture was splendidly rendered, and throughout, save for an occasional slip and uncertainty of attack, the orchestra was all that could be desired. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted with his usual ability, and Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ. At the end of the performance, the composer was summoned to the platform and greeted with unanimous and prolonged applause. The National Anthem, as usual, preceded the concert, which was given to a crowded audience.

ARMAND SEMPLE.

LONDON LITERARY AND ARTISTIC SOCIETY.

The inauguration of the third season of this society was held at St. James's Banquetting Hall on Tuesday evening, November 13th. The proceedings opened at 8.30, with a concert (promenade), under the direction of Herr Liebich, of which the following is the programme:—

Piano Duet, "Rip Van Winkle" ..... Liebich
Miss Ada Stephens, and Herr Immanuel Liebich.
Baritone solo, "If Doughty Deeds" ..... Sullivan.
Mr. G. M. Fernor.
Contralto solo, "The Silver Rhine" ..... Hutchinson.
Miss Pattie Michie.
Violin solo, "Rêverie" ..... Danclas.
Miss Louise Fowell.
Soprano solo, "No hand but thine" ..... O. Barri.
Madame Washington Walker.
Piano solo, "Invitation à la Valse" ..... Weber.
Madame Sophie Tueski.
Mezzo-soprano solo, "The Green Trees whispered" .. Balfe.
Miss Minnie Grahame.
Baritone solo, "Out on the Deep" ..... Lohr.
Mr. G. Fernor.
Violin solo, "Air de Ballet" ..... Beriot.
Miss Louise Fowell.

Of the above, the violin playing of Miss Louise Fowell, and the singing of Miss Pattie Michie, call for special mention. The arrangement of "Rip Van Winkle" (pianoforte duet), is clever and well harmonized. After the concert a lecture was given by E. L. Sellon, Esq., F.L.S., F.S.A., on "Art-Aspects of Modern Dress," followed by an animated discussion, in which several gentlemen joined. At eleven o'clock there was a grand ball, with orchestra. This society affords a centre where ladies and gentlemen of literary, musical, scientific, or artistic tastes, may meet for social intercourse. One cordially sympathises with the objects it has in view, and wishes it every success.

Conductor - AUGUST MANNS.

Again I have to record a decided success on the part of an English composer. The concert-overture by Mr. Harold Thomas afforded the greatest pleasure, both to the critics who were present, as well as to the general audience. Although it had never before been heard at Sydenham, in 1880 it was performed at the Philharmonic concert and subsequently by the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, the Hackney Choral Association, and at the Covent Garden Theatre concerts, &c., and—contrary to the adage—the more familiar it becomes, the better it will be liked. Many beautiful touches in it remind one of Sir Sterndale Bennet's writings, and as Mr. Harold Thomas had the benefit of his instruction this is perfectly natural. A better school—if I may use the expression—or a better master, it would be impossible for him to follow. Like Sir Sterndale Bennett's overtures, it possesses much poetical beauty and forcible expression, whilst its construction is extremely artistic and shows its author to be possessed of that common sense in art, the influence of which in the direction of sobriety of judgment and self-restraint is altogether wholesome. No phase of art that lacks sobriety and self-restraint will seriously or permanently affect men's minds or the growth of culture.

The grand old Gluck, "the regenerator of the opera," was listened to with profound respect, in the selection from his classical and dramatic opera. His music afforded pleasure both to the student, as well as to others who may be unconscious that the burning desire of infusing into the modern opera a more poetical spirit and a more intense dramatic expression, is only another attempt to do what he—at least in his day—so admirably succeeded in doing.

It is universally acknowledged that no pianoforte player has ever excelled, and but few equalled, M. Vladimir de Pachmann in interpreting the refined music of Chopin. Many qualifications are required for this: a very delicate touch and exceedingly refined style, the most rapid and accurate use of the pedals, with a clear comprehension of the beautiful harmonies and modulations, and an unfailing accuracy of finger in the frequent embellishments. All these qualifications are eminently combined in M. de Pachmann, as was proved beyond doubt—if indeed proof were needed—on Saturday last, in Chopin's well-known concerto.

Miss Griswold, the lady vocalist, was very successful. She has a voice of surprising compass and good quality, with very powerful expression.

Schumann's symphony, and last of all Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," completed an interesting and successful concert. R. S.

Another reporter writes:—

I must express my thanks for the capital concert of Nov. 17th. Schumann's early symphony is full of interesting themes, if faulty in other respects; and Wagner's overture, a glorious marine painting of amplest canvas, certainly stirred up Mr. Manns and his masterful "crew"—not to break the metaphor—to a magnificent voyage of discovery. You might almost hear the winds whistle through the cordage, and sniff as well as see the briny wave. Herr de Pachmann quite enraptured his audience and won a bis. He repeated the "Toccatina." The concerto of Chopin suits him to the very letter. Miss Griswold, from New York, and recently very successful at the Grand Opéra of Paris, has received due and deserved acknowledgment from the daily and weekly press. She has a clear, powerful, and penetrating soprano voice of extensive compass and ringing "head" notes. The lower part of the register is the only weak part of the organ; and Miss Griswold, whilst taking every advantage of French elegances, in respect of pronunciation and delivery, would do well to avoid any tendency to the criard school. The absence of the vile vibrato, the vice of the age, is acknowledged and commended by our daily contemporaries. I agree with the pundit of the Times about the English song, quite unfit for a Crystal Palace concert, however passable in the drawing-room and elsewhere. Nor can I say much more for the French scena, really a long laboured recitative, and nothing more. Miss Griswold's phrasing and execution give evidence of the best training. A. M.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Quartet in C minor (Op. 18), No. 4, for two violins, viola, and violoncello	Beethoven.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti.
Song, "Dalla sua pace"	Mozart.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Sonata in E minor (Op. 90), for pianoforte alone	Beethoven.
Mr. Charles Hallé.
Adagio in E major, from Concerto in A minor, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment	Viotti.
Madame Norman-Néruda.
Air, "Il mio tesoro"	Mozart.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Quartet, in A major (Op. 26), for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello	Brahms.
Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Holländer, and Piatti.
Accompanist	Mr. ZERBINI.

The above programme was announced last Saturday, but a printed apology for Mr. Maas, who was suffering from severe sore throat, was circulated in the hall. Mr. Abercrombie sang in his stead, substituting Handel's "Where'er you walk" and Berthold Tours' "The Angel at the Window," for the songs chosen by Mr. Maas, who is advertised to appear at to-day's concert. Mr. Abercrombie is gifted by nature with a really beautiful tenor voice, and there is also something else in his favour—his entire and very apparent self-possession. His "art," however, cannot be so cordially commended. Tours' charming little song calls for the most simple and unaffected rendering; Mr. Abercrombie's strained expression and undue holding-out of certain notes took from it all its simple grace. With greater experience, he may possibly acquire a purer style.

What possessed Mr. Hallé to take the final movement of the sonata at such a fearfully slow pace? The very character of the melody, its two-four time, with sometimes only one note of melody in a bar (a minim), the accompaniment being absolutely uninteresting, demands a moderate speed—for each separate note holds a meaning the composer intends; the listener who would keep awake requires note to follow note at a greater rate than 60 to the minute. "Sehr singbar" should not be translated "very drawling," and "nicht zu geschwind" is a negative expression, which should not be rendered positively, "slowly and drearily." With one exception (passing them cursorily in mental review, this assertion is, I believe, correct), Beethoven concludes his pianoforte sonatas with a quick or very quick movement: the "nicht zu geschwind," therefore, probably only means "not so fast as most finales." Mr. Hallé, being twice recalled for his truly striking—though not agreeably so—performance, added a Schubert impromptu to the programme; and Mdme. Norman-Néruda, after her graceful rendering, to Mr. Hallé's accompaniment, of her solo, satisfied unreasonable demands with a Bach gavotte.

Brahms' noble quartet was played before a fast-thinning audience. Even in the usually steadfast orchestra, ugly bald places appeared, and other parts of the hall fared proportionally worse. This is much to be regretted, being calculated to encourage the directors in excluding modern works more severely than heretofore from their scheme. It therefore becomes the duty of those who may be thus persuaded, to declare that the indifference arose, not from the natural conservatism of the audience, nor from any want of merit in a work which, with the same writer's Op. 25, stands at the very head of the list of chamber music by living composers, but from an uninspired and unsympathetic rendering. Brahms makes great demands on his interpreters as well as his audience—a rugged energy, fiery impetuosity, great intellectual vigour, and a most absolute sympathy between the performers. If all these conditions are not fulfilled, the hearers will also fail to prove intelligent and sympathetic recipients of the good things provided, and will rudely and ungratefully leave their seats, perhaps declaring "Brahms is dry, harsh, and ugly," never reflecting that his discords may be "harmony not understood."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Many of the connoisseurs were absent on Monday night, to hear Audran's opera at the Royalty Theatre, but those who attended this concert did far better, as will be seen from a report elsewhere. Spohr's Quartet in E minor ought not to be little known in England; the director of the "Popular," first produced it in 1862, during the 4th season. The tonality of the movements is peculiar; the larghetto moves in C major, and the minuet in G, with a wink, however, at the original key, by writing the "trio" in the relative (E) minor. The applause that ensued at the end may be described as boisterous, considering the select quality of the audience. Beethoven's pianoforte trio needs no comment; the largo assai in the tonic minor has, in a complimentary sense, every "mark of the beast." How Herr de Pachmann interprets his favourite master's "Funeral March," ought to be known by this time to the habitués; an additional treat after his fine performance on the previous Saturday at Sydenham. An encore fructified in a well-known Berceuse of Chopin, by one lady mistaken for a "notturne" as if not known, alas! Signor Piatti's solo, which opened Part II, is an adaptation of an air from a Sonata by Germiniani, (written for violin or violoncello); an antique and old-fashioned style of Canzonet, a sort of "Lied ohne worte." The title "Follia" seems to require explanation, for the air is dignified gravity itself. A Variation ensues, where the melody is arranged to the third string, with a staccato accompaniment for the pianoforte; an episode in F further varies the subject, and an excursion is made to A minor, and back to D minor, by the simple service of sharpening the mediant (C) of the new key. The clever accompanist rather overbore the interpreter, Signor Piatti, of course, evoked a furore. Miss Santley made a better choice of pieces in the second than in the first part. Rubinstein's songs are truly charming. His loveliest of pianoforte trios (in B flat, Op. 52), is set down for next Monday night, with Miss Agnes Zimmermann as pianist. I regret to notice her choice of that very dry solo, Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques." A. M.

COMIC OPERA AT THE ROYALTY THEATRE.

Miss Kate Santley opened this pretty theatre on Monday night with M. Audran's comic opera (operetta), entitled "Gillette," adapted from the French by a very clever littérateur, Mr. H. Savile Clarke. The story is a very awkward affair in the original, if that word may be used, when the delicate incidents are converted from one of Boccaccio's "moral tales." I have read the whole of the "Decamerone" in "choice Italian," Mr. Savile Clarke, however, has extracted the poison, and left some of the honey; his libretto might, perhaps, be smarter and more highly flavoured with modern wit, but it is generally approved as the work of an experienced and accomplished dramatic writer.

The music of M. Audran, composer of that peculiar piece, called "La Mascotte," must be dismissed as poor, trivial, and commonplace. An ironical critic predicted a run of 100 nights, when I accosted him in the lobby on Monday. Some persons (in England) cherish a notion that musical men care only for "something deep," and, as once said of an exalté critic, that they breakfast on a fugue of Bach's, take luncheon (properly Nuncheon) with a "lied ohne worte," and appease their hunger, at or after dinner, with two symphonies and a concerto. Silly folks are these, to be answered by Solomon, "according to their folly." All good music, of whatever kind, will command respect and admiration. I lately lauded the arrangement, at St. James's Hall, for a provision of elegant overtures and pretty tunes, during the trying hour of heavy dinners. But M. Audran, in this case, only offers an effervescent beverage that tastes sweet, to evaporate with a hint at dyspepsia. The tunes certainly take the ear, but always tell the same old story. The scoring for the band would hardly satisfy a disciple of Wagner, but here I pause in awe. One learned judge (with whom I agree) pronounces the orchestration to be of an elementary kind. Another, who writes to the effect that Audran has written invita Minervâ, and repeated himself, proceeds to say that the airs "are set off by orchestration, such as in the amateur's opinion, make up for many shortcomings elsewhere." Most of the choruses are in unison, and the "two part" writing would be torn to pieces at the Royal Academy, if presented in the form of "exercises." The finale of Act II, a soldier's chorus, is thought to be the best specimen of the music. "Les Pommes d'Or," and Mr. Walter Slaughter contributes a capital chorus in Act III. The air of a Tarantelle, danced in rather original style, by Miss A. Wilson, is ascribed to Mr. Hamilton Clarke. The principal parts of the operetta are allotted to Miss Kate Santley, Miss Kate Munroe, Mr. Walter Browne, and F. Kaye; Miss M. Taylor, and Mr. W. J. Hill. A dreadful and most unmeaning bore, a "Chief of Police," is cruelly thrust upon the audience. His nonsensical talk about the majesty of the law reminds me of the old parish beadle at the Surrey Theatre, under the Davidge dynasty, who (in April, 1841), ranted about offences against the authorities." The verdict of the audience on this operetta can hardly be called a favourable one, but this is not the fault of Mr. Savile Clarke. A. M.

PEOPLE'S ENTERTAINMENT SOCIETY.

On Saturday the 17th inst., the above Society, which is in its sixth season, gave the third weekly concert of its present session, in the Lammas Hall, Battersea, to a crowded audience. Before I venture my remarks about the programme and the way it was carried out, a few words concerning the scheme of the People's Entertainment Society would not I think be amiss. The object of this excellent Society is to give concerts of good and sound music from time to time to the lower class, entirely free of charge. As I stood in the Hall and watched the much-abused labourer and the stalwart working man take their seats in the most orderly manner possible, until the place was at last crowded to excess; as I watched their eager faces, anxious for the programme to commence, a feeling of great satisfaction came over me, to think that this enormous body of men (who, as the outside world imagines, spend their Saturday nights in drunkenness and rioting), should meet together as quiet and peaceable citizens, for the purpose of enjoying really good music. They were orderly throughout, talking only between the pieces, and from beginning to end bestowing attention and applause, in a manner that calls forth the highest praise. This admirable Society is under the immediate patronage of Lord and Lady Folkestone, both of whom were present, Lady Folkestone taking a leading part in the programme, of which I shall presently speak. By showing such untiring interest, by displaying such unflinching energy, in helping forward the work of this truly benevolent object, Lord and Lady Folkestone have faithfully earned, and eminently deserve, the most hearty thanks and congratulations from us all, by which scheme, let it be said, Art is not lowered, but rather let me say, that its dignity is sustained, and its mighty influence spread broadcast. It would of course be impracticable to have given a Symphony of Beethoven's with the full resources of a large orchestra, but had it been given, I really believe, from what I heard and saw of Saturday's affair, that these men would have appreciated it as much as persons more educated, than themselves assuredly more than certain longwid enthusiasts, who, after hearing one of Beethoven's marvellous orchestral works, could only find vent to their artistic feelings, by yawning out, "very pretty." The way that these poor men enjoyed the music, well done, proves to me that education is not the only key by which the door of our musical appreciation can be unlocked. Mr. R. T. Pitt opened the programme with an American organ solo, at which instrument he presided during the evening. The madrigal, "In going to my lonely bed," was admirably rendered by a well-trained choir, under the able conductorship of Mr. Leslie, who deserves great praise from the promoters of the People's Entertainment Society for his painstaking in bringing the choir to such a successful issue. There were three or four other pieces for the choir, all well performed and appreciated. The programme contained Mendelssohn's beautiful motet, "Hear my prayer," Lady Folkestone sustaining the well-known solo part. Of her singing I cannot speak too highly, the purity of expression, and the careful production combined, find for her a place among genuine artists. Miss Campbell sang prettily; Mr. Henry Yates requires more study, Master Pitt bids fair to hold a good position as a violinist, while Mr. James Budd, who is well known at these concerts, received an ovation. Lord Folkestone, after an admirable speech, requested all present to join in singing the National Anthem, and thus a most enjoyable and pleasing entertainment concluded.

GEO. F. GROVER.

LEEDS.

The Church of England Sunday Schools gave their annual concert last week in the Town Hall before an audience which filled the building in every part. The choir consisted of 700 voices, selected from Church schools in Leeds and district. The principal vocalists were Mrs. C. Clark and Messrs. Harrison and Westerman. The first part of the programme consisted of sacred, and the second of secular music. The concert opened with the National Anthem, and the first part included Dr. Wesley's fine anthem, "Blessed be the God and Father," in which the solo passages were efficiently sung by Mrs. Clark. The chorus, "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn), helped to bring out the careful training of the juvenile choir, the trio being impressively sung by the principals. A carol by Joseph Barnby, and a couple of hymn-tunes, were included in the first part of the programme. The second part comprised a number of glees and part-songs, to which full justice was done by the juvenile choir. Dr. Creser presided at the organ, and played a couple of organ solos: Variations on a Theme, by Handel, and Guilmant's Grand Chœur, his efforts being loudly applauded. Mr. J. W. Young, of Wakefield, made an efficient conductor, and succeeded in keeping the juvenile choir thoroughly under control. The new opera, "Victorian," by Mr. Julian Edwards, conductor of the Royal English Opera Company, was performed with great success at the Grand Theatre last week. The principal artists were Mdme. Julia Gaylord, Miss Lucy Franklin, Messrs. Packard, Jas. Sauvage, and A. McGuckin. The other operas produced during the week were, "The Piper of Hamelin," "Maritana" (in which Mr. J. W. Turner appeared), "Faust," and "Lily of Killarney." The performances were in every respect satisfactory.

BIRMINGHAM.

The first half of the concert given by the musical section of the Midland Institute, on the 3rd inst., was chosen "In Memoriam" of the late Mr. J. H. Chamberlain, the eminent architect, whose sudden death in the previous week cast such gloom over the whole town. Mr. Chamberlain's last lecture—on "Exotic Art"—was delivered in the same room in which these concerts are held; and only a proper feeling it was which suggested the introduction of the opening items, with their mournful associations. At the same time it will be seen how difficult it is to deal critically with music, of a funereal character, performed in memoriam, and not produced on artistic grounds alone—if, indeed, criticism is not altogether out of place. Miss Hale performed Mendelssohn's Lied ohne Worte, No. 3 of Book 5, followed by Chopin's Funeral March, from the Sonata Op. 35. I have never before heard this gifted lady (whose talent as a pianist deserves to be much more widely known) play with greater success; devoid of showy display, yet with all the requisite "feeling" and refinement of artistic delivery, her performance, of the Chopin piece particularly, was a truly classic one. Mr. Chamberlain had no mean gifts as a poet, in addition to the many other faculties through which his genius displayed itself. A poem from his pen, set to music by Mr. T. Anderton (with viola obbligato) was performed on this occasion. The words, as the reader will judge for himself—if the Editor be good enough to find space for the copy I send—are certainly above the amateur average. As to the musical setting, those who are acquainted with Mr. Anderton's work will know that a melodious, refined treatment of the poetical idea was only to be expected. The song is of the arioso type, but melodious in the ordinary sense of the word, without sacrificing consistency of expression with the somewhat sombre tone of the poetry, the latter being more reflective than emotional in character. I am not aware whether Mr. Anderton's music is yet published. Mr. Eleanor Farnol, whose fine powers of musical declamation I have before took occasion to remark upon, did her very best with the song. In the second part of the programme she sang also a very effective composition of Mr. Frank L. Moir —"My Crown"—not, however, of such refined, poetical interest as Mr. Anderton's; and Mendelssohn's vocal lieder, "The Charmer," and "Zuleika," which latter, beyond their simple musical interest, did well to display the fair artist's voice. Herr Pettersen, with Mrs. Hale, gave a very fine rendering of Grieg's Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 13. Beethoven's early quintet in E flat, for strings, and Mendelssohn's youthful sestet (published posthumously as Op. 110), were rather wanting in "go." Herr Pettersen, however, was a kindly substitute for Mr. Ward, who was unable to appear at the last moment. Some allowance, no doubt, must be made under these circumstances.

I was, unfortunately, prevented from attending, being away from Birmingham at the time, Mr. Stockley's first orchestral concert of the season, which took place in the Town Hall, on the 8th inst. I can do little more, therefore, than give the bare outline of the programme. The band performances included Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Mackenzie's "Rhapsodie Ecossaise," the ballet music, "The Dance of the Houris," from Ponchielli's opera, "La Gioconda;" and the overtures to "Mignon" (Thomas), and "Egmont" (Beethoven). At this concert Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, always a favourite with the Birmingham public, made her farewell appearance. The worthy conductor himself informed me that her singing that evening was in every respect equal to any of her past efforts; that her performance of Beethoven's magnificent scena, "Ah! perfido," was a remarkably fine one. In addition to the mentioned piece, she sang the recitative and air—"With verdure clad," from the "Creation," and "Let the bright seraphim," from Handel's "Samson"—pieces well chosen to display the singer's familiar voice and style, only regrettably for the last time. Mr. Edward Lloyd, though a trifle nervous, I am told, was very successful in the splendid Wagnerian excerpt, "Almighty Father" ("Rienzi"), as also in the fine recitative and air of Gounod's "Lend me your aid," which by this time has become the well-ridden "Cheval de bataille" of concert tenors. He made less impression with the air, "Some village Hampden," generally pronounced the best hit in Mr. Cellier's musical medley to the words of Gray's "Elegy." Messrs. Ward and Abbott gave still another duo concertante of Spohr's for two violins (No. 8, Opus 67). Candidly, I did not regret missing this; but the violinist's tribute to the manes of that fascinating writer—though paid so often in public as to become a somewhat tiresome insistance—was, it seems, well rendered on this occasion by the artist, and well approved by the audience. At the next concert, to take place Dec. 13th, I hope to be present, and to furnish a better report. The "Eroica" Symphony is to be performed, and Miss Agnes Miller, who has well established her reputation here, will take part in the same movement's Piano Concerto in C minor. Madame Clara Samuell and Sig. Foli are engaged as vocalists.

The second of the series of six concerts given this season by Mr. Stratton took place on the 13th inst. in the Masonic Hall. On all previous occasions I have had to remark on the presentation of certain novelties; but the programme of last night outbid its predecessors in this respect, since every one of the pieces in the following list, if not in each instance, "first performances," were more or less new to Birmingham audiences:—"Morceau de Concert" (M.S.) for pianoforte, two violins viola, violoncello, and contra-basso (F. E. Bache); Hebrew melody, for viola (Joachim); Variations, Op. 34, pianoforte (Beethoven); Sonata in F major, Op. 8, piano and violin (Grieg); quartet in A minor, Op. 29, strings (Schubert).

At Mr. Stratton's concerts the pianist generally receives the lion's share of the work, and the concert of last evening formed no exception to the rule. It will be remembered that last season Miss Constance Bache was incapacitated by an accident from taking part in the concert at which she was previously announced to appear. It was, therefore, all the more welcome a reception which awaited her this time. The first item in which she took part is one of the many posthumous works of her brother, the lamented F. E. Bache. Mr. Stratton has already enabled us to form a good idea of the work of our late townsman, and the little work produced last evening is very similar in character to those which have been previously introduced at these concerts. The same melodiousness, spirit, and fluent writing which characterised those works I have before commented upon are also present in this composition. The title alone of the work would disarm criticism on classic lines. Those only could find any fault with the piece for whom lively melody and graceful harmonisation have no charm. The piano certainly is the instrument most engaged throughout, the string instruments seeming much too secondary; but altogether the work is a delightful specimen of purely idiomatic English art. The next item in respect to novelty (since, although not unfamiliar to Birmingham amateurs, it has not been performed here for some years), was the Schubert quartet. This work, ranking next in its class to the quartet in D minor, is one demanding unexceptionable performance. If it cannot be said that the performance of last evening attained to that standard, it was yet a very worthy attempt. Miss Bache chose for her solo performance the variations on a theme in F major, the earliest of Beethoven's works of this class with opus number—certain earlier works being distinguished in other ways. The work is one that makes no great demands upon the intellectual capacities of the listener, not upon more than the ordinary executive abilities of the pianist. Miss Bache's style is in every way that of the true artist; it is a little reserved, perhaps, but certainly the piece is not one calling for much fire and passion. Her touch is beautifully clear and distinct, and the phrasing most artistic. Miss Bache's playing, in short, is studied and delicate, rather than giving the impression of spontaneity. In the duo sonata with Mr. Abbott, Miss Bache helped to better familiarise us with a composer who has already gained our ear. In Grieg's music, however, it is often forgotten how much the interest is largely owing to that element in the work for which the composer can hardly have more than the credit of skilfully presenting,—the Northern folks, melodies au naturel. The same allowance in the way of adapting national melodies would hardly be made, I fear, in the case of an English writer. Much in Grieg's music is dependent upon the poetical associations of the said melodies. The bizarre contrasts, the awkward technicalities, the "hurdy-gurdy" strains—despite all this, the romantic charm of the work is incontestable. All great art is, however, cosmopolitan; Grieg's art is but local. Whether Scandinavian music is or not but a passing fashionable cultivation, such a performance as the excellent one on this occasion cannot but have proved enjoyable to all, as, indeed, was sufficiently manifested. Of Mr. Ward's performance I can only say that it was a conscientious artistic fulfilment of a thankless task.

Br.

BEDFORD.—The first serial concert of Herr Polonaski and Mr. Bond-Andrews was held on Friday evening, Nov. 16th, at the Working Men's Institute, before a large audience. Niels Gade's fine, but most intricate, sonata in D major and minor stood first on the list, and received a poetical rendering from the two exponents on the violin and pianoforte. Of Mr. Bond-Andrew's solos may be named, as particularly perfect, Chopin's Berceuse, the polonaise in C sharp, and Liszt's 2nd "Hungarian Rhapsody," which was encored, and replaced by the player's own pretty piece "Return from the Maypole." Herr Polonaski regaled his audience with his own "Pensée Fugitive," and texts of Bach, Gounod, Hauser, and Vieuxtemps. In the "Air Varié," by Leonard, the clever fingering of four strings on the violin was sufficiently displayed. Mdme. Polonaski sang airs of Rubinstein and Brahms. The success of this concert will, possibly, guarantee the establishment of these meetings as a local institution.

DORCHESTER.—A concert in aid of the Abbey Church Restoration Fund, was given on the 13th inst., in the Girls' School. The artists were: Miss Amy Florence (soprano), Miss Evelyn Dickens (contralto), Mr. D'Arcy Ferris (tenor), Mr. Cattermole (baritone), Mr. B. Carrodus (violinist), Signor Cusani (pianist).

BRIGHTON AQUARIUM ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The second of these attractive concerts took place on Nov. 17th, the room being as before, crowded. The orchestra, increased to 50 performers, acquitted themselves in a manner it would be impossible to praise too highly. The opening number, Rossini's overture to "Guillaume Tell," was superbly played. This was followed by the beautiful andante "con moto," (from Symphony No. 4 (Mendelssohn), played with great effect, which elicited hearty applause. Special mention is due to Mr. Dobell for his admirable oboe solo. Mr. Kuhe appeared at his best in Weber's Concert-stück, the opening melody, with its staccato accompaniment, being played with delicious crispness; the Con molto agitazione was finely given, the crescendo being worked up in a masterly manner to the Presto assai, which was taken at a tremendous pace, and brilliantly kept up to the end. The work was played without book, and Mr. Kuhe was rapturously encored. Miss Damian, who has a remarkably fine contralto voice, met with a very flattering reception, her songs, "The Spirit Song" (Haydn), "The Last Dream" (Cowen), and a new song "Go and Forget," by Stephen Adams, being rendered in a very artistic manner. She has a faultless intonation, and sings with great feeling. A work for orchestra, a concert overture, "A dream of happiness," by Charles E. Stephens (a delightful work, abounding in melody), was capitally played. Considering that it was known in the orchestra that the gifted composer was among the audience one can quite understand that the instrumentalists did their very best accordingly. The other orchestral works were Scherzo from Symphony No. 9, (Beethoven), Ballet Music Nos. 3 and 4 "Sylvia," (Delibes) (the latter a charming little Danse, found great favour with the audience and was encored), grand selection, "Cinq Mars" (Gounod), and Grand March No. 4, "Aux Flambeaux" (Meyerbeer), introducing the National Anthem. One must not forget the pianforte solo in the second part, Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln," arranged by Liszt, and Valse in A flat (Chopin), played in Mr. Kuhe's finished style. Mr. Jacques Greebe was as usual everything that could be desired as a conductor, and Mr. Greebe, senr., acted in his capacity as leader with great skill. Madame Klauwell (vocalist), and Mr. Howard Reynolds (solo cornet) are announced for the next concert.—Local paper.

A MUSICAL VISIT TO MANCHESTER.

Pleasure is sometimes said to be another word for novelty. Certainly Herr Richter's concert on Nov. 7th was a keen pleasure for the musical elect of Manchester, and perhaps it owed some of its zest to its novelty. If we had been accustomed to the sight of the German leader's commanding figure, with no desk or music-stand to impede his personal influence—if this had been a familiar sight to us for a score, or even a couple of years, then who knows?—it might have seemed tame and ordinary. As it was, when novelty was associated with power, the applause and bravos of the audience testified to their appreciation of it. That audience consisted of such of the citizens of Manchester as delight in music, and take any favourable opportunity of hearing it, as well as the body of professionals, whose faces we all know so well. But these two sections of society are not large enough to fill the large Free Trade Hall, and one is sorry to learn that the concert was a heavy loss to the originators of it. Perhaps Herr Richter does not understand the constitution of our concert-going Philistines, whose numbers are necessary for financial success. The programme was made up entirely, with the exception of Beethoven's Eroica symphony, of numbers from Wagner's operas. Herr Richter is known to be a distinguished exponent of Wagner's music. I certainly never heard the beauties of the so-called music of the future more expressively wrought out than by the orchestra under his lead. Wagner is spiritual, if nothing else; with him everything resolves itself into an endeavour after an adequate and searching interpretation of emotion. This is his aim, whether or not we may agree that it is a high one; and in comparison with this he reckons as nothing musical science, rules of form, or any other machinery of his art. In this way he often offends the fastidious in taste; but that he sometimes gains very beautiful and singular effects, is undeniable. Some of his themes stand forth on a rich and formless background of orchestral sound, like a picture glowing in mosaic. The constitution of the Wagnerian orchestra is also objected to by many. Certainly, when it is employed in its full force, when several blatant trombones are necessary to enforce the theme in the midst of a very Babel of instrumental noises, then, though the effect may be electrifying, it is also trying to ears educated on classical diet. One cannot see that the motive theory is at all necessary to the appreciation of Wagner's music. As heard under Herr Richter's direction it is beautiful enough in itself to require no explanation. The poetical side of it is then so exquisitely developed—the whimsical, the telling side of it, as exemplified in the "Walkuren-ritt"—(the writer has heard it well delivered under a Manchester leader)—that the listener who fails to feel an answering thrill in the complex consciousness of his inner life, need not go to the opera-house to learn to admire Wagner. Perhaps it is impossible that the pathos, the heart-searchingness of the music to "Tristan and Isolde," for instance, can appear so utterly beautiful to those who have not seen the opera on the stage,—who have not watched the solemn dying of Tristan on the sea-shore, and his weary waiting for the coming of Isolde, while the careless shepherd blows his pipe, and his faithful follower scans the face of the heedless ocean for signs of the expected ship. The music must be doubly beautiful to those who have seen these things. But again I say that this added appreciation does not come from an intimate acquaintance with the leading motive; nor does the recollection burden itself always with the labelling of certain strains; it is only that the general fitness of the music to the sentiment is recognised, and that a greater knowledge of it makes its beauties more apparent. The mind is unlocked, is accessible, so to speak, to it; the first hearing only turned the key. For it is certain that the hearing of music is not like the reading of a book: the second and third times bring more enjoyment than the first. That this statement may prove true also of the next Richter concert, which is promised for the spring, I hope and trust; and to those who wish to hear Wagner at his best, I would emphatically say, "go and hear Hans Richter's interpretation of him."

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The St. Patrick's Oratorio Society inaugurated its season on 16th inst. with an excellent performance of the "Messiah," at the Cathedral. If I mistake not, the society has opened each season since its formation with the "Messiah," as per arrangement of the committee, I understand. Truly one never tires of the marvellous work: equally true it is that no other in the long list of oratorios can command such an audience, yet I very much question on looking over the numerous works there are suitable for performance in cathedrals, whether it would not be more desirable to rehearse a different work for each performance.

I cannot speak too highly of how the work was performed on 16th inst. Soloists and chorus seemed alike desirous of placing the event on record as a highly creditable rendering of the work, and they may well rest content with their laurels. The solo parts, for male voices were sustained, as usual, by the members of the Cathedral choir, which is sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the manner in which their work was got through. The soprano music was sang by Miss Russell with very happy effect. The choruses were admirably rendered by a nicely balanced choir of one hundred voices who sang throughout in excellent time. The conductor, Mr. Marchant, presided at the organ with his usual ability. For their next performance (Feb. '84), they intend producing "Te Deum," by Sullivan, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The Dublin Musical Society are busily engaged in rehearsing the "Elijah," which they propose producing on 26th inst.: principal artists, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mrs. Scott, Fennell, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Santley.

NORWOOD.—A grand evening concert was given in the Hall, Weston Street, Upper Norwood, on Monday evening, Nov. 19th, by Miss Harriett Morgan, assisted by Miss Lottie West, Mdlle. Keighley, Miss May Petit-Jean (pianist), Mr. Stanley Moore, Mr. Burton Bouquet, Mr. William Dubber, and Mr. F. E. A. Cavell (reciter); the chief honours being won by Miss Lottie West. There was not quite so numerous an audience as could have been desired for the fair bénéficiare.

PRESTON.—On Thursday evening, Nov. 15th, Mr. James Tomlinson (organist to the Corporation), gave a recital on the grand organ in the New Public Hall. The programme was: Concerto in B flat (Handel), overture to "Zanetta" (Auber), "Marche Cortège" (Gounod), overture to "Othello" (Rossini). The concerto, rendered with great taste, was well received. There was a very large attendance.—The Preston Church Choir Association held their first festival on Monday evening, Nov. 19th, in the Parish Church. The choirs who took part in the service were Holy Trinity, St. George's Parish Church, Fulwood, St. Luke's, St. Paul's, All Saint's, St. Saviour's, &c. Mr. Galloway (organist St. George's) ably conducted, and Mr. J. Greaves (organist of the Parish Church) presided at the organ, with great ability. The music was as follows: Processional hymn (by Sir G. A. Macfarren); Psalms (E. J. Hopkins and J. Stainer); Magnificat (Goss); Nunc Dimittis (J. Barnby); Anthem, "Sing to the Lord" (Mendelssohn); processional hymn (J. W. Elliott). The anthem was rendered in a pleasing manner. The church was well filled.—The Preston Orchestral Society gave their first concert for this season on Monday, Nov. 5th, in aid of Longton New Church. The programme included: Overture "Caliph of Bagdad" (Boïeldieu); "Connaught Lancers"; Gavotte, "Elegie" (Williams); overture, "Chevalier de Breton" (Hermann); galop, "Feu de Joie" (Thure); and the songs rendered during the evening were "True till death," "Tit for Tat" "Ehren on the Rhine," etc. The vocalists and instrumentalists were all amateurs. The society has made great improvements since last season. Mr. J. Hogg wielded the bâton, and Mr. Pye presided at the pianoforte.

Herr Scheletterer, of Berlin, has the first volume of his "History of French Music" in the press.

It is stated that an International Guitar Club has been started at Leipsic, and an International Guitar Journal has now been started.

At Copenhagen, a new opera, "The Spanish Students," by a Danish composer, Lange-Müller, has appeared. The work is said to be excellent.

It is intended to perform "Tristan und Isolde" at the Dresden Opera next spring, with Fraulein Malten and Herr Dettmer in the principal parts.

The legend of "Loreley" is again to be set, this time by a composer of the name of Mohr. How many more (this is not a pun) will set the unfading story?

There can be no doubt about the artistic vitality of Mozart's best operas. The four hundredth performance of "Zauberflöte" at Berlin took place on Nov. 2nd.

The success of Mr. A. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" at Coburg will, it seems, secure the performance of the work at Berlin, and possibly in other places in Germany.

The prize recently offered by the Belgian Academy of Science for the best essay on the "Life and Works of Grétry" has been, it is announced, awarded to M. Michel Brenet, of Paris.

Mozart's "Mass in C minor," given in Paris on St. Cecilia's Day, Nov. 22nd, was previously revived on Easter Day at Toulouse in 1882, then exciting much interest. It will be sung there next Easter also.

Dorothea Attila, daughter of Richard Wagner's youngest sister, is said to be in New York, almost destitute of the means of living. With her are four children and her crippled husband, once a captain in the Prussian army.

The funeral of the lamented M. Hegel, director of Le Ménestrel, etc., took place in Paris, on the 12th. The music at St. Roch included movements by Gounod, Verdi, etc., and M. Gigout played the Dead March in "Saul." Several eminent artists assisted, and a large number of notabilities were present.

The valuable and important lectures and meetings of the Society of Arts have commenced for the season.

A new "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, with a Bibliography of English Writings on Music," compiled and edited by James D. Brown, an experienced writer and assistant librarian in the Mitchell Library, Glasgow, will presently appear. The author proposes to give more consideration to the claims of contemporary musicians than has yet been given in any similar work. The compiler adds in his prospectus: "All composers of standing have been adequately noticed, more comprehensively in many respects than formerly; while complete lists of works, with dates, are given in each case. The almost unworked field of American musical biography has also been carefully noticed; and in every department, whether British, European, or American, numerous original articles will be found. What will serve to give the work a further and higher value in the eyes of persons interested in music, is the fact that nearly the whole of the articles on living musicians are based on information furnished directly by themselves, and which is consequently thoroughly authentic. The total number of articles will be between 8,000 and 9,000. A supplement in connection with the work is a 'Bibliography of English Writings on Music,' which forms an Appendix to the Dictionary. It is designed to display under appropriate headings the English Literature of any subject, as Acoustics, Æsthetics, Composition, Counterpoint, Notation, Organ, Psalmody, Singing, &c."

On the 28th inst., a performance will take place at the Gaiety Theatre for the benefit of Mr. Nordblom, the tenor singer, on which occasion the first two acts of Auber's now rarely heard "Fra Diavolo" will be given, with Messrs. Nordblom, Charles Lyell, Richard Temple, Aynsley Cooke, and Falconer Leigh, and Miss Rose Hersee in the cast. Mr. Joseph Maas will also appear in the course of the performance, and the entertainment will include, among other items, a scene from "Patience."

PURITANISM AND MUSIC.

THE lines of demarcation which for ages have divided the Church from the Sects, have in these later times, so far as outward service is concerned, become almost obliterated. The Church no longer enjoys the monopoly of bells, stained glass windows, gothic architecture, polychrome decoration, or organs. The Dissenting community has at length found out that good music is a most valuable adjunct to divine worship. The typical Nonconformist, so admirably depicted in "Hudibras," who considered that he best served his Maker by fiercely hating "steeple-houses" and droning interminable psalms through his nose, is now extinct;—though it is just possible that faint reflections may linger in Welsh valleys. Excellent organs are to be found in the best Dissenting chapels, and they are frequently presided at by skilled players, thoroughly competent to discharge the important duties committed to them. The elaborate services, hymn-tunes, and chants of our foremost Church composers are performed with as much zeal and intelligence as the best served of churches can display. It must indeed be a matter of congratulation to all who seek for unity, at least in non-essentials, to observe that so far as music is concerned, the old sharp lines which once separated Church from Chapel have well-nigh disappeared. In the Service of Praise in which the divine art necessarily plays so important a part, we can now all meet in harmony on a common platform.

But this uniformity does not entirely obtain. There are at least two quarters where the devotional value of music is not thoroughly recognised. Prejudices have still to be fought, and a considerable educational process has yet to be gone through, ere narrow-mindedness and bigotry can be effectually conquered. It seems useless to point out to the average Scotch mind that the worship music of Biblical times was so elaborate that a large and complete orchestra was required for its proper rendering. The Scots care neither for this, nor the certainty that some such scheme will form part of the hereafter worship. That fearful instrument of torture, the bagpipes, has more charms for northern ears than the religious tones of the majestic organ. It may be that the "bawbee" is at the bottom of the opposition to the king of instruments in Scotland. Organs cost much money, and it is the nature of the canny Scot to think carefully over all unproductive outgoings. The long-winded discussion that has lately been in progress in Scottish Assemblies as to whether it is lawful to employ "artificial instrumental aid to worship"—as it is put—has again been decided in the negative. One might ask these Gramists North of the Tweed, whether any of their preachers will ever happen to be provided with a set of false teeth, to remove such an artificial aid to worship from their mouths, during the service of praise and prayer. Surely the use of such unnatural dental organs is clearly in violation of their dearly loved, but illogical, precept. Such an amusing exhibition as certain Scotch ministers have lately afforded the world shows that civilisation has yet much work to do before extreme Puritanism is vanquished. However, neither that display, nor the abuse lavished on the "kist o' whistles," nor the suggestion that the accursed thing was the invention of the Evil One, and its players are true sons of Belial, will prevent the gradual introduction of the instrument into Scotland. When one reads that an unfortunate farmer in the land o' cakes was lately solemnly debarred from Church privileges because he allowed a harmless dance to be given in his barn, it is patent that what, we are told, is the greatest of the divine Christian virtues, lacks as yet active appreciation in that part of the United Kingdom. The Presbyterians have probably forgotten that dancing once was an important feature of early ceremonial worship. They are doubtless profoundly ignorant that it still forms a part of the public service, existing in at least two branches of the church of to-day, viz., the Coptic and Abyssinian.

The second example of existing Puritanism to which attention may be called is exhibited in a book just issued by the Society of Friends. In the new "Rules for Christian Discipline," which the Quakers have put forth, the omission of the Rule which has hitherto discountenanced music is significant. It shows the change of opinion as to lawfulness and unlawfulness which has taken place in the midst of the members of the sect since their ancestors sternly denounced music as a "foolish and wicked pastime." But it is necessary for them to advance further on the educational road, and quite remove the fetters with which their ruling powers yet deem it necessary to enchain music. Condemnation is still extended to those, "musical "exhibitions in which an attempt is made to combine "religion with a certain amount of amusement." For the benefit of Quakers and Quakeresses who are able to appreciate and profit by the hearing of Oratorios, it may be pointed out, that there is a delightful amount of elastic obscurity in this dictum. What is a "musical exhibition," and what constitutes "amusement"? According to the Biblical and Church interpretation, exhibition simply means "a setting "forth." As all music must be set forth in order to be heard, no heresy can clearly lurk under this quaint expression. "Amusement" is probably from the Italian root, musare, to muse or meditate upon. According to JOHNSON, "to amuse," means "to "entertain with tranquillity; to fill with thoughts that "engage the mind without distracting it." Surely, no better definition can be found of the spirit in which the oratorios of the great masters should be heard. This is just the temper in which we should listen to HANDEL's immortal "setting forth" of the tale of the "Messiah," whether the locale be a concert-room, or still better, a church. If the hearing of this work "amuses" us with tranquil thoughts that engage the mind, its intended illustrative purpose has been completely fulfilled.

It will thus be seen that there remains a way open for Quakers innocently to recreate themselves in music without breaking this Puritanically framed law. The thought just crosses one's mind whether in view of the performance of the blasphemous "Parsifal," with which London is threatened, the alarmed Quaker authorities have not framed the regulation with the occult object of protecting their members from "a musical exhibition, in which an attempt is "made to combine religion with a certain amount of "amusement."—In that case their forethought over WAGNER's production is decidedly commendable.

A VETERAN ARTIST.

Truth has an interesting account of the career of JOHN ELLA in the number for Nov. 1st, including anecdotes of the worthy Professor's long connection with all the notables in the musical world for a space extending over sixty years. And what an experience this must have been during the advance of music here! Prof. ELLA joined the opera band in 1821, when it consisted of 48 players. Under COSTA's development chiefly, this same orchestra, when ELLA retired from it in 1848 had been increased to a staff of 82 first-rate executants. There are two directions in which the labours of the shrewd painstaking founder of the Musical Union, will ever secure distinction for his name—the practical development if not the planting in the public sense in England of high class chamber music; and the introduction of the Analytical Programme, an invention which has done much for the intelligent growth of the English people in matters musical. JOHN ELLA has ever pursued a liberal policy as regards the introduction of new music of merit; and it is to be regretted that the Musical Union is not still in existence now there are distinct signs of an English school of chamber music. The writer in Truth, whose hand is pretty clearly to be traced in his words, tells that JOHN ELLA was once asked his opinion of WAGNER's operas. His answer was "History tells us that EURIPIDES presented SOCRATES with the writings of HERACLITUS which were characterised by obscurity and involution. "EURIPIDES afterwards asked for SOCRATES' opinion of the works in question, 'What I understand,' "SOCRATES is said to have replied, 'I find to be "excellent, therefore I assume that to be of equal "value which I do not understand.' Well," said ELLA in 1859, "under the shelter of SOCRATES I "reserve my opinion of WAGNER's declamatory treatment of the lyric drama." ELLA's operatic experience certainly entitled him to speak on this question, even before WAGNER's position was an accepted fact, and the writer of the notice rightly says, "It "would be a good thing if other people practised now "and then a similar reservation." After an unusual career which brought him into contact with a legion of great men of all types and professions, the old musician, now blind, alas! sits quietly at home, still doing kind things for his brother artists, still engaging his friends in delightful recollections of many musicians and much notable music, and still the good friend of many who rejoice in his friendship. Long may he be spared to enjoy the calm repose which so happily comes to those who have earned and are blessed with a quiet old age.

E. H. TURPIN.

PROFESSIONAL EAGERNESS.

A DISTINGUISHED Conservative writer, and a man by no means willing to have existing institutions disturbed, tells us that he only realised what rest and peace meant upon going one Sunday into a village Church and finding a clergyman able to forego the temptation to indulge in oratorical display, and so the very anti-type of the model London preacher of power, who is bent upon preaching himself either into a bishopric or into magazine popularity. It may be that the writer is somewhat caustic and severe in these words, but it is only fair to allow that living in the London regions of respectability he has probably had to suffer much. Now, this professional eagerness is not peculiar to the sacred profession of the Church's ministry; nay, rather it is so common as even to invade the pulpit, the last place in which indeed it ought to be found. The musical profession is, alas! not free from undue professional eagerness; and the presence of this objectional spirit in the musical world is not unnatural; for those who follow music as a profession, generally find themselves greatly tried by the severe competition of a much overcrowded calling and by the comparative want of prominent opportunities for the advantageous employment of their artistic powers. The distinction between hunting after popularity and establishing artistic reputation, is one which calls for the earnest attention of all artists. The old Scotch proverb which runs something like—"Spare speaking, spare speeding" seems to counsel, like the saying of a shrewd lawyer, that a man is valued in accordance with his own estimate of himself, a certain amount of self-praise and self-announcement; but the artist should seriously ask himself if any personal attempt to discount public favour is either a dignified proceeding or a safe course. One of the greatest of modern English painters observed that there was a distinct danger to the artist in the possession of a reputation which was empirical in the sense of being, through personal or friendly efforts, greater than his real claims to distinction could justify. This danger is twofold; for it not only exposes an artist to the liability of being generally mistrusted when he comes to be fairly assessed by critical opinion, but it involves so much anxiety and exertion to be wasted in the maintenance of a blatant popularity, that the misguided artist loses something of that calm, innate self-trust which is a necessary possession of the truly earnest worker, not to add that he encounters a nearly equally serious loss of valuable time. "Never advance "a step you may have to recede from," is therefore wise advice to the artist. Feverish empiricism shows itself in many ways; as in the taking of personal steps to get all one's performances and movements duly chronicled in the papers, in too eagerly seeking for opportunities for the display of one's own acquirements, and in being too anxious to be identified with every scheme which seems to promise publicity. To all who practise such forms of self-seeking advancement, time usually brings a sharp revenge. The grocer may imprudently say, "Try our best tea, it is the best in the world," but the artist must wait to be understood and appreciated. As a rule, too, the true artist will be known by his combined power of "working and waiting." To no class of worker—even in these pushing, elbowing, and not over scrupulous times—can the grandly patient words, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou "shall find it after many days," have a truer application, than when applied to the case of the true artist; whose gifts indeed are ten-fold the stronger for the possession of faith, self-sacrifice, and patience.

E. H. TURPIN.

Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen," and a miscellaneous selection of sacred music, were given on the 22nd inst. (St. Cecilia's Day), at St. Alban's, Holborn. The soloists were: vocal, Master H. Tebbutt, Messrs. Powell, Knott, Hall, and H. Pyatt; violin, Master Gerald Walenn; organ, Mr. Fardinarson Walenn, the organist of the church.

Mr. George Carter has just received a very flattering report on his Italian opera "Nerone," from a high musical authority in Trieste. The opera has been found, after a severe trial, to be, "rich in beauty, truly splendid, and abounding in ingenious, contrapuntal artifices." The orchestration is thought to be greatly developed, in contrast with the thin and flimsy scores of the old school. "Nerone" will presently be produced in Trieste.

REMINISCENCES OF AN OLD REPORTER.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The genteel mob of mixed people, musicians, amateurs, loungers, fashionable folks that shew themselves off by ordering their carriages before, and arriving after, the time at concerts, may be reminded that the taste for classical chamber music was not only cultivated, but inspired by the founder of an institution entitled the "Musical Union." Mr. Ella has been so eloquently eulogized by an accomplished writer in Truth (I suspect the Rev. Mr. Haweis, of St. James's, Marylebone), that I shall do little more with regard to the personal matter than say "ditto to Mr. Burke" and pass on to safer generalities. I use the adjective (safer) because Prof. Ella happens to be rather particular and cares little for compliments.

Half a century ago, only a "happy few," fewer than the British combatants at Agincourt in the reign of Harry the Fifth, could stand the severe test of what is called "chamber" music, or in other words, compositions for four-string instruments and a pianoforte. The ordinary listeners go in for singers of trumpery "royalty" ditties, or require a full band at an enormous expense, not that they can appreciate complicated orchestral combinations, but that they insist on broad and striking effects of some kind or other. But the schoolmaster has been abroad. The "Popular Concerts" prove so much; but of these famous educational entertainments be it ever remembered that the "Musical Union" was the precursor. Inventors and projectors who have been benefactors to the world rarely reap the fruits of their skill and industry. Sir Hugh Middleton's New River left him high and dry in a financial sense, and the enormous profits of the concern fall into the lap of commonplace shareholders. Posterity devours the feasts that wise men have made.

Mr. Ella founded the "Musical Union" in 1845, and it flourished until the year 1880, when the age and infirmities of the venerable director compelled him to retire. To speak more correctly, the Director made a transfer of his interest in 1880, and the result, for reasons that need not be stated, was not satisfactory. Professor Ella continued to act, if one may use the phrase, as master of the ceremonies—none could do the work so well—and his successor in the direction played in the quartet. Musicians, however eminent, may not be men of business. The "Musical Union" ended at the end of the season in 1881, signalised by the appearance of Rubinstein, who came over from St. Petersburg not only to conduct his own opera "Le Démon" at the Royal Italian Opera, but to play at the Musical Union for Professor Ella, to whom he had recently dedicated a quartet (played on this occasion). Rubinstein would have travelled from Kamtschatka to serve his friend Ella, and I know that he felt sorely vexed, not to say angry, when he found that the Musical Union was falling to pieces merely for want of the previous generalship, perfect in its way as Napoleon's, yet without the alloy of arbitrary discipline or the sledge-hammer sort of domineering that disfigured the military career of the "little corporal."

The writer in Truth has graphically described the séances of the Musical Union. The season always began on the Tuesday after Easter Tuesday, and continued until the end of June, or at latest until the first week in July. Once a fortnight was the rule, and once a week (at the tag end of the season) the exception. The members met like a family party, for outsiders were not wanted; the "strangers" mainly consisted of notable composers and artists from the continent, only to name Mendelssohn, Hector Berlioz, and Meyerbeer. The orchestra stood in the centre of the room, not at the far end; the audience thus commanded a good view wherever seated. Mr. Ella always recommended the galleries and the (grand) orchestra as the best places, because "sound ascends." The scheme, printed and distributed on the Saturday before the concert, and concise as the texts of Tacitus, gave you the pith of the various compositions, and did not distract the mind with long and tedious quotations from the score. Three concerted works and a few pianoforte solos occupied the minds of the habitués, from half-past three o'clock until about a quarter-past five. On the "Grand Matinée," when the two Septets of Beethoven and Hummel were always pièces de résistance, the concert began at three. Mr. Ella allowed no vocal numbers. One or two, tolerated for a time, on the Grand Matinées, were subsequently discontinued.

I have been and am still complaining of the talking at musical performances. Woe, thrice woe, to the visitor who thus offended at the Musical Union! Professor Ella, at half-past three, uttered one significant "hush," and a golden silence prevailed. Any ignorant and uninitiated stranger that presumed to raise his or her voice above a whisper would have been made to look rather more foolish than that proverbial dog at the "Derby" race, always in the way at the wrong time. As a rule, however, ill-bred people at the Musical Union were raræ aves. They could not obtain admission. The audience, apart from the aristocratic Committee—many of the noblemen accomplished amateurs—consisted of the élite of musical London; composers, professors, critics, and connoisseurs. The motto of the director might have been Odi profanum vulgus, et arceo!

I shall revert to the Musical Union before Christmas. Mr. Ella enlisted all the great artists of Europe for violinists, sufficient to name Ernst, Joachim, Vieuxtemps, Auer, and Papini; for pianists: Rubinstein, (facile princeps), poor Lübeck, Madme. Schumann, Dr. Von Bülow, and Jaell of Paris, whose premature death makes me lachrymose as I write—a thoroughly good, genial fellow, with a touch to charm Diogenes, in or out of tub.

Anecdotes hereafter. For the present, one or two. Lübeck, in 1865, once lost his presence of mind and missed his point in the "Sonata Appassionata." According to Mr. Ella, he had looked round and saw Rubinstein enter the stall; this unnerved him. Rubinstein, unhappily affected with partial blindness, has his mental vision—the eyes of his mind—wide open and always open. Hating any approach to egotism, let me mention one little circumstance as an encouragement to attentive students of the art. As a matter of business, and for my own private improvement, I always take copious notes, at the opera or the concert, and am not afraid to ask technical questions. Knowledge ought to be its own reward, but a recognition from any distinguished personage cannot but be flattering unction to the soul. Well; Rubinstein, at a special concert of the Musical Union in 1877, had played his piece and was sitting on one of the "audience" benches. He beckoned to your unworthy servant and bade me sit by him. "I have observed," said the great man and velvet-fingered pianist, "that you always listen to the music attentively and take so many notes. I like to see it." In 1881, the maestro always recognized me in the corridors after the concert and offered his hand.

The author of the article in Truth (already referred to) forcibly contrasts the "receptions," or musical and artistic réunions on the continent with the meetings in England. Referring to the weekly parties held by Mdme. Erard at the Château de la Muette, Passy, Paris, the writer pithily remarks: "When shall we look in England for such a centre of art and music? In London, such cultes degenerate into cliques, full of insufferable affectation and narrow conceit. We have good musicians and great painters, but the level of popular appreciation and artistic feeling is still very low; and there is nothing large, Catholic, or genial about our musical or artistic circles. With us, musicians are asked to great houses to amuse the company. At their own gatherings they congregate to extol their own talents; but where do they meet, as they used to meet at Ella's, or as they meet at Mr. Erard's, to forget themselves and worship at the shrine of art?"

A. M.

On Wednesday evening, Nov. 14th, the third of the series of "Entertainments for the People" was given at Bethnal Green Road Congregational Church, by the Bethnal Green Choral Society, and an efficient band. Farmer's oratorio, "Christ and his Soldiers," was excellently rendered. The soloists were Mdme. Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. H. Prenton. Miss West received a hearty encore for the solo, "By Jesus' Grave," as did also Mr. Murton for "When I survey"; Mdme. West and Mr. Prenton were warmly applauded. The conductor was Mr. R. A. Slater; pianist, Mr. W. West; organist, Mr. E. T. Temple. The audience numbered between 700 and 800.

A sale is announced by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, to take place on the 26th inst., of a large collection of musical property, including pianofortes, American organs, harps, a small chancel organ, real Chinese cymbals, Italian and other violins, tenors and violoncellos, etc.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

On Saturday last a new comer to London was introduced in the performances of Mr. J. W. Phillips, a talented Sheffield organist. His first solo was "Grand Chœur" (Salomé). Next Kullak's "Pastorale," as arranged by Mr. Best, received much applause. Mozart's "Fantasia" in F minor was well rendered and duly applauded. Next came a "Cantabile," by Lemmens, and a favourite Fugue in G major, by Krebs, admirably played and greatly applauded. The final organ solo was Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Mr. Phillips is a player of real promise and power; his style is decisive and brilliant. Mr. H. Lazarus displayed his fine tone and wonderful command over the clarionet technicalities in solos by Weber and Mohr, being in both cases most warmly greeted and having to bow his acknowledgments, wisely declining the encore compliment. Miss A. Larkcom sang charmingly; including as her first song Gounod's beautiful "Ave Maria." She was encored in Diehl's "Going to Market," and gave another song in response, Marzials' "When my Jim comes home," was also sung. Mr. Fountain Meen accompanied. To-night Mr. E. H. Turpin will be the organist; Signor Erba, violin; vocalist, Miss Clara Myers. On Saturday, December 1st, M. Alex. Guilmant will appear, that gentleman, to our artistic gain, availing himself of the comparative freedom of the organists of the Roman Church from duty in Advent and Lent, to pay periodical visits to England. On December 10th, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Haydn's "Spring," will be performed, under Mr. McNaught's direction, by band and chorus of about 160 performers.

MIRFIELD.

The following is the synopsis of the organ belonging to Mr. S. Wilkinson, Pilling, of Mirfield and Bolton, now being entirely reconstructed by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield. The instrument, which contained three manuals and pedal organ, was built in 1872, by Mr. Halmshaw of Birmingham, and has been added to or altered by, one or two provincial firms—more recently by the London builders, Messrs. T. C. Lewis and Co. Prior to its erection in the new music room at "Fir Cottage," Mirfield, Mr. Pilling has decided upon the following specification, which will doubtless prove to be one of the most complete and finest chamber organs in the North of England.

35. Swell to Pedal.	40. Great to Pedal.
36. Swell Super-Octave.	41. Solo to Pedal.

Two composition Pedals to the great organ.
Three „ „ to the swell organ.

The stops numbered 33, 36, 37, 38 and 40 are acted upon by Pedals, in addition to drawstop. The coupler stops are placed over the swell keyboard in front. The drawstop jambs, book desks, and fittings are of ebonized wood, and are fixed at an angle, the drawstops being of solid ivory of neat design. Three independent reservoirs are placed in different parts of the instrument, so as to ensure an ample and steady supply of wind.

A pneumatic lever is applied to the swell organ and its couplers. The louvres to both swell and solo organs are placed vertically, and the pedals communicating with them "poised on an axis," that they (the louvres) will remain stationary at any point. The organ is blown by one of Bailey's engines, placed with separate feeders and reservoir in a room underneath the organ. The case, which is artistic in design, is carried out in American walnut, with burnished spotted metal front pipes.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.

Two organ recitals were given in the Church of St. James, Tunbridge Wells, by Mr. E. Bunnett, Mus.Doc. Cantab., F.C.O., on Thursday, November 15th, on the occasion of the opening and dedication of the organ. The following were the programmes :—

HUDDERSFIELD.

Mr. J. R. Brooke, organist to the Earl of Carlisle, Castle Howard, gave an organ recital at the Fine Art Exhibition, on the 13th inst., when he performed the following programme in a very able manner :—

Overture, "Samson"	Handel.
Festal March	Clark.
Air, "If with all your hearts" ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn.
Offertoire No. 3	Wely.
Prelude and Fugue in G	Bach.
Air, "But Thou didst not leave ("Messiah")	Handel.
Chorus, "Let us break their bonds asunder" ("Messiah")	Handel.
Andante	Silas.
Prelude and Fugue on the name of BACH	Rinck.
Air, "Total Eclipse" ("Samson")	Handel.
Chorus, "Halleujah, Amen"	Judas.

Mr. Joel Hurst was the vocalist, and he gave his songs with great taste and judgment.

GLASGOW.

A recital of organ and sacred music was given in Maxwell Parish Church, by Mr. James Pattinson, Mus. Bac., Cantab., on the 15th inst. The programme included.

Concerto in F	Handel.
Andante maestoso—Adagio—Allegro.

Offertoire in G, No. 4	Wely.
Concerto No. 4	Handel.
Fugue in D major	Bach.
Air, with variations, in A	Bishop.

PRESENTATION TO THE ORGANIST OF SALISBURY CATHEDRAL.—An elegant testimonial has just been presented to Mr. C. South, the late organist of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, City, by the Rector, Churchwardens, and congregation thereof. It will be remembered that Mr. South was recently appointed to the important position of organist and choirmaster of the great Cathedral of Salisbury, which possesses one of the largest and finest organs in England, after his having for some years filled a similar post at the pretty little church placed under the shadow of our own St. Paul's. The presentation was made at the residence of the Rev. W. H. Milman, M.A., rector, and took the form of a silver teapot, cream ewer, sugar basin, and salver, around the inner part of which latter runs an inscription in Latin, setting forth and bearing testimony to the high qualities—not only musical, but personal likewise—of the recipient. It may be added that prior to Mr. South's original departure from London for his new and enlarged sphere of usefulness, he received a handsome marble timepiece, bearing a plate with the following inscription :—"Presented to C. F. South, Esq., for 15 years Organist and Choirmaster of St. Augustine and St. Faith, London. A tribute from the gentlemen of the Choir to his many excellences, both as a musician and a friend. July 19, 1883."

EXETER.—The recital on Nov. 17th proved one of the most enjoyable of the present series. Both the organist (Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus.Bac.) and the vocalist (Miss Grace Godolphin) received numerous marks of approval. Miss Godolphin was recalled, and bowed her acknowledgments after singing "Happy art thou, Magdalena," from Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalene"; her appreciative rendering of Wellings's "Golden Love" elicited so pronounced an outburst of applause that the audience would not desist until she began to repeat the second stanza; while the mingled playfulness and sympathy that marked her vocalisation in Molloy's ever-welcome "Kerry Dance" earned a similarly enthusiastic compliment. Mr. Wood's selections were much admired. The accomplished organist had intended to play the "Andante con moto" in E flat, dedicated to him by M. Guilmant, but as the eminent Frenchman had included the composition for the 5th prox., Mr. Wood with the assent of his listeners, substituted one of Field's nocturnes. Mr. Wood was encored after playing Rossini's overture to "Il Tancredi" and Benedict's Fantasia on Welsh airs. The Handel Concerto in F, with the cuckoo and nightingale duet, were exceedingly liked, and so were Mendelssohn's chorus, "Heaven and earth display," Beethoven's slow movement (pianoforte concerto in C), and Frost's March in B flat, with which the performance terminated.

IMPROVISATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In an article on "Improvisation," published in your last week's paper, I find an omission too important not to require correction. One of the greatest of improvisers of all times was J. N. Hummel, pupil of Mozart, and to the last an intimate friend of Beethoven, who held Hummel's opinion in such high esteem, that he asked him, when on his deathbed, "Is it not true my dear Hummel that I have had talent"? ("Nicht wahr mein lieber Hummel ich habe talent gehabt"?) Hummel's improvising in public—which I have the good fortune to remember as some of the most powerful impressions of my youth—had left a similar effect on such men as Spohr, Aloys-Schmidt, Lindpaintner, &c., with all of whom I was on terms of intimacy, and have had many conversations about the subject of improvisation, on all occasions of which Hummel, in their opinion, came to the fore!

I am also of opinion that in the highest kind of improvisation there is a power at work, infinitely above the "certain amount of quick discrimination or discernment in accepting or rejecting thoughts or ideas as they present themselves," which your correspondent names as conditions.

I deem it to be a state of mental ecstasy which is closely allied to second sight; it is self-acting, and not only does not require watchful thinking, but really seems to exclude it as a drag on the flow of imagination. That highest kind of improvisation is heaven-born genius!

That one can develop the art of extemporising by tuition up to a considerable height, even in minds not gifted with it spontaneously by nature,—admits of no doubt, and I in my long career as teacher, have invariably made it a special labour of love to do it systematically, but I repeat, one can only "go thus far and no farther" with training.

I cannot conclude my letter without, in justice, referring to one amongst us who possesses a most remarkable gift of improvising fugues. I allude to the well-known composer Silas; he will extemporise in the strictest style on several subjects given him, and jocularly add himself, a popular tune—working them with masterly skill together, in a manner to surprise anyone who understands the extreme difficulty of such a procedure. Mr. Silas certainly should be induced to give the public at large, as well as his private friends, the advantage of his extraordinary talent.

Yours truly,
FERDINAND PRAEGER.

A RIGHT OF PERFORMANCE QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I see by your issue of yesterday (Nov. 17th) that you say (speaking of "Music at City Dinners") John Barnett's Trio in G, "This magic wove scarf," comes out occasionally like a glowworm, etc. Will you please inform me whether this Trio may be sung in public without payment of a fee? A reply in your next issue will oblige,

Yours faithfully,
A. W. H. H.

Passing Events.

Mr. C. Duval's entertainment at St. James's Hall, has reached its tooth presentation this evening.

The programme of an organ recital to hand this week from the North has the ingenious and suggestive sentence "Collection in Silver," printed in capital letters,

The Kyrle Society performed Handel's "Samson" at St. Jude's, St. Peter's Park, on Nov. 21st, under the beat of Mr. M. L. Lawson; Mr. E. H. Turpin being the organist.

Mr. W. Beattie-Kingston is reported to be engaged upon the English version of the "Bettelstudent" for Mr. Carl Rosa. No better or more experienced translator could be found for the task.

The numerous friends of Mr. J. W. Davison will regret to learn that he has been suffering from severe illness at Margate. It is gratifying to be able to add that he is now much better, and shortly returns to town.

At the Stepney Meeting House a performance of Handel's "Samson," was given by the Kyrle Choir, on Nov. 14th. The soloists were Miss Agnes Allen, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Albert Orme, Mr. A. Herbert; conductor, Mr. Malcolm Lawson; organist, Mr. E. H. Turpin.

The announcement is made that Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott, the composer of the oratorio, "The Widow of Nain," "Treasure Trove," and some popular humorous glees, has been appointed one of the professors at the Royal College of Music.

Mr. A. H. Day's weekly organ recital at the Parish Church, Seaford, Sussex, on the 18th, consisted of a selection from the "Messiah," which was listened to by a large congregation. Next Sunday the programme will be a miscellaneous one, as usual.

Local papers call attention to the successful performance of a "Triumphal March" for orchestra and military band, by a young composer, Mr. H. J. Edwards, Mus.Bac., of Barnstaple, at the Covent Garden concerts, and note that other compositions of the same writer have had success.

Mdme. Ronniger gave her first recital at Kensington Town Hall, to a numerous and appreciative audience, but unfortunately the amateur element was too prominent in the programme. The professional vocalists were, Miss Gwynne, and Messrs. Gray, Warwick, and Ria, and a Captain Acklom; Mdme. Ronniger and Miss Goad gave some most interesting recitations. Mr. Charles Marshall carried out the duties of accompanist and conductor very ably.

The many admirers of Purcell will be glad to know that it is proposed to perform his anthem, "O praise God in his Holiness," with the original string parts, at the church of St. Luke, Chelsea, on the evening of Sunday next, under the direction of Mr. F. E. W. Hulton, Mus.Bac., organist and choirmaster of the church. It is said this will be the first performance, probably, of the work in its complete form since the death of the great composer. Service commences at 7 p.m.

The Athenæum announces that Mr. Dannreuther proposes to give a series of four musical evenings, to take place on Thursdays, Nov. 22nd and 29th, and Dec. 6th and 13th. The programmes are highly interesting from the number of important novelties promised. These include Tschaikowski's Pianoforte Trio in A minor; a Quartet in C by Mr. Henry Holmes; a Sonata in A minor for piano and violoncello, by Grieg, Op. 36; and a Sonata in A for piano and violin, by H. von Herzogenberg. Among the other works promised are Mr. Hubert Parry's Trio in E minor and his newly published Pianoforte Quartet in A flat, and Sgambati's Quintet in F minor, Op. 4.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber.
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D (Op. 82) ..... Reinecke.
Mons. A. Fischer.
(His first appearance at the Crystal Palace).
Song, "Bells in the valley" ("Euryanthe") ..... Weber.
Miss Mary Davies.
Symphony No. 8, in B minor ..... Schubert.
Solos for violoncello:—"Nocturne" ..... Chopin.
"Tarentella in A minor" ..... Fischer.
Songs, "Absence," and "If love were what the rose is" ..... Cowen.
Miss Mary Davies.
Ballad Airs, "La Colomba" ..... Mackenzie.
(First time at these Concerts).

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

It has been well said—the same by the way could be equally well said of almost every other good and familiar work—that the overture to "Der Freischütz" is so well known and so truly appreciated by all lovers of orchestral music, that any eulogy or criticism upon it would be more than superfluous. Nevertheless, it may be well to call to mind that as it was by the music of this opera that Weber first made his mark in the world, we therefore owe to it—with its overture—the possession of "Euryanthe," "Oberon," and a host of other compositions, everything being made easy to him by its great success. Beethoven was as much taken with it as anyone, and said, "I should never have expected it of that quiet fellow. And now he must write operas, one after another, straight ahead, without beating about the bush." That it was splendidly played last Saturday, va sans dire.

Reinecke is chiefly known in England as an excellent pianoforte player and composer for that instrument, but his vocal works include masses, an oratorio, cantatas, &c., and his orchestral compositions are very numerous—two or three symphonies, concertos, quartets, quintets, overtures, &c. He occupies a very high position in his native country, being at the present time director of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig. In the concerto in D for violoncello, his orchestration is bold, clear, and masterly, and the solo performer has full scope for producing effects of a charming kind. In the hands of M. Fischer, the composer found a true and conscientious interpreter. The performance was well received, but scarcely so well as it deserved. In Chopin's Nocturne and in M. Fischer's own Tarantelle, he was more heartily applauded.

Schubert's unfinished Symphony was decidedly the gem of the concert! Although never wanting in individuality, an able writer says, "We find in his later works reminiscences of Beethoven, but compared to Beethoven Schubert is a feminine character, more talkative, gentler, tenderer. True, he has powerful movements, nor is he wanting in breadth and vigour, but as a gentle entreating woman beside a masculine character—though only in comparison to Beethoven. Compared to others, he is masculine enough, for he is the most vigorous and original of modern writers." Happily on this occasion we had nothing tacked on as a finale to the two completed movements.

Miss Mary Davies sang in a chaste and refined manner, as she always does, and the concert was brought to a close by the beautiful ballet airs from Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba."

R. S.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

On Wednesday, 28th November, the following selection of music was sung, under the direction of Dr. Bridge:—

Madrigal, "O hear me love" ..... Nanino.
" "Come let us sing" ..... Byrd.
" "Hope of my heart" ..... Ward.
" "Draw on, sweet night" ..... Wilbye.
Motet, "Kyrie Eleison" ..... Palestrina.
Madrigal, "Fye, thou silly shepherd" ..... Arcadelt.
" "Phillida, come tell" ..... Vecchi.
" "Lady, your words" ..... Wilbye.
Chorale and Fugue, "Glory to God" ..... Graun.
Madrigal, "Phillis, go take thy pleasure" ..... Weelkes.
" "Love wakes and weeps" ..... Read.
" "Lo, where with flow'ry head" ..... Morley.
" "Now peep, bo peep" ..... Pilkington.
" "A garden is my lady's face" ..... Alison.
" "Lady, when I behold" ..... Wilbye.
" "Now is the month of may" ..... Morley.

A stained glass window has been placed in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey in memory of the late organist, Mr. Turle, and his wife.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Quintet in C major, No. 5, for two violins, two violas, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer, Zerbini, and Piatti.
Recit., "Deeper and deeper still" } ..... Handel.
Air, "Waft her, angels" }
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Humoreske (Op. 20), No. 1, for pianoforte alone ..... Schumann.
Mr. Charles Hallé.
Quartet in E minor (Op. 11), for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello ..... Fibich.
(First time).
Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Holländer, and Piatti.
Song, "Dalla sua pace" ..... Mozart.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Trio in C major, No. 7, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
(First time).
Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist ..... Mr. ZERBINI.

A new work, by an author unknown even by name to most musicians in this country, is a rare and most interesting appearance at these concerts. It is, therefore, the more pleasant to be able to record that the Quartet by Fibich met with a decidedly favourable reception—an honour to which its merits thoroughly entitle it.

Zdenko Fibich is introduced to the readers of the programmes as a Bohemian, whose musical education was conducted at Prague and afterwards at Leipsic. He has now nearly completed his 33rd year, and, it appears, holds the posts in Prague of conductor of the National Theatre and Chorus Director of the Russian Church. He has written much, and judging by the quartet before us, his works are of a character to attain speedy popularity. Of the school of Scharwenka and Tschaikowsky—a school which has sprung from the new spirit which was infused into our Art by Chopin, though we are often told Chopin founded no school—his writings will have a particular fascination for those who are attracted by, what the programme calls, "The Bohemian style of quartet-writing." This "Bohemian style," be it observed, is strictly classical in form; its chief distinctiveness apparently arises from the somewhat vague, dreamy, long-drawn out nature of its subjects. In this respect Fibich's work stood out in strange contrast to the final Trio (which, by the way, nearly half the audience did not stay to hear, as the concert was prolonged far beyond the usual limits), the subjects of which are, more than is customary even in Mozart, simple, downright, and child-like. The Quartet is in three movements, the first and last in the usual forms, and a slow movement—an air with variations. Many of the effects are striking; the opening, with the long-held dominant of the key at once arrests attention, which the succeeding melodies well sustain. May this, and other works by the same writer, have frequent opportunities of appealing to English musicians!

Mr. Maas's artistic performances were duly appreciated, and Mr. Hallé's reading of the Humoreske was interesting and satisfactory; though the work itself is perhaps calculated to impress a small circle of sympathising listeners, rather than a large and mixed assembly, who look for a well-prepared, logically-arranged oration, rather than gentle, lovely, confidential speeches.

An unusual distraction occurred after the slow movement of the opening quintet. A lady in the orchestra had fainted during its course, and a lengthy pause ensued before the finale, to enable her, with much difficulty, to be carried out.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

Mr. E. Aguilar will resume his excellent recitals of pianoforte music the week before Christmas.

In connection with German opera in London, another statement has appeared that Mr. Ernest Gye, director of the Royal Italian Opera Company, has entered into an agreement with Herr Angelo Neumann for twenty performances of German operas at the Covent Garden establishment, to be given next year, during the usual season of Italian Opera performances, and in alternation therewith. The German répertoire will, it is said, comprise Wagner's "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde"; besides which, Gluck's "Orfeo" and "Armide," Nicolai's "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor," and Goldmark's "Die Königin von Saba," are named for performance. It is said that Mdme. Albani and Mdme. Pauline Lucca will be associated with the German company in some of the performances.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Last Monday evening the director arranged the annexed programme :—

PROGRAMME.—PART 1.

Quartet in A major, No. 5, for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L Ries Holländer, and Piatti.
Song, "Hearken, ye children of men" ..... Borton.
Miss Carlotta Elliot.
Etudes Symphoniques (for pianoforte alone)..... Schumann.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann.

PART 2.

Songs :—"My heart and lute"..... Kjerulf.
"Chanson de Florian" ..... Godard.
Miss Carlotta Elliot.
Trio in B flat (Op. 52), for pianoforte, violin and violoncello..... Rubinstein.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist .. Mr. H. DEACON.

M. Vladimir Pachmann, lately the lion both of the afternoon and evening concerts, has given place, for the time being, to Mr. Charles Hallé and Miss Agnes Zimmermann. Of Mr. Hallé's doings a good account is given elsewhere. Miss Zimmermann, a German by birth, happens to be a distinguished prize pupil of our own Royal Academy, which is proud to have her name on the list of its students. The young lady has studied in the best schools here and abroad; she has given to the world, as often before stated, some admirable compositions for the chamber, and the Director of the Popular Concerts has made her one of his half-dozen pianistes d'élite. Miss Zimmermann may be styled a strictly objective player, intent on a severely accurate interpretation of the text "according to copy," without pretension to enforce the reading by any intrusive suggestions of her own individual ideas. In a word, to borrow the teminology of her own country's transcendental metaphysics, Miss Zimmermann looks to the "Ding an sich," and, as Fichte would say, maintains the passivität (passivity) of the ego. Scholastic execution, however, is one thing, choice of pieces another. Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" in C sharp minor, like other and more important forms of the "variation" type that might be mentioned—a notable "32" to wit—fail to excite the soul of the listener, and, to speak in a stage whisper, they are felt by many to be positively dry and tedious. The persistent minor mode, only relieved by a change (before the final march) to G sharp minor, tends to aggravate the monotony. Miss Zimmermann more especially excelled in Variation VI., played with exquisite delicacy and finish, and in Variation IX. (G sharp minor), where the audience listened with rapt attention. A "furious" encore (not reported in the Times), induced a charming little gem, suspected to be Miss Zimmermann's own.

Mozart's string quartet, fifth of the famous "Haydn" set, was led by Madme. Norman-Néruda. Careful auditors were particularly delighted with the precise extension of the minuet and the finale, where Mozart writes contrapuntally and with extra elaboration. Rubinstein's pianoforte trio must be repeated before Easter 1884 "by desire." Teeming with melodic brilliants, of purest ray serene, the adagio in D minor and the presto (scherzo) in F, with its rapid scale passages in descent, must always stimulate and arrest attention. The reading of the adagio was perfect, the second theme proper, in B flat, decidedly grand. Miss C. Elliot chose songs to suit her voice and won recalls.

Miss Zimmermann, on Monday next, is to play in a new pianoforte quartet in A flat by Mr. C. Hubert Parry. She chooses a Fugue of J. S. Bach for her solo—why not a sonata? A. M.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Gounod's "The Redemption," first heard at Birmingham in 1882, was performed for the third time at the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening, by the "Royal Albert Hall Choral Society," with Mdme. Albani as principal soprano. Mr. Barnby the conductor was the first to produce the work of Gounod in London, and Mr. Manns followed suit. Judgment has already been delivered by competent authority; next week, perhaps, at a review of the performance, the question of merit and value may again be raised, not with any intention to reverse previous expressions of opinion, but in a broad general and comprehensive way.

Mr. F. Penna's Benefit Concert is announced for Dec. 10th, at the Steinway Hall.

MR. J. B. BONAWITZ'S "HISTORICAL RECITALS."

Mr. J. B. Bonawitz held his third recital on Wednesday evening, Nov. 21st, when he played (as will be seen) a long list of pianoforte pieces by the old masters. The living composers were represented by St. Saëns, Reinecke, W. Macfarren, and Liszt. This recital was the most decidedly successful of the three already held; a large audience listened to the music as if in a church, and remained until the end of the evening. The event of the soirée was a splendid performance of Beethoven's grand sonata in B flat, Op. 106, a monster work, never heard (in England) until Madme. Arabella Goddard introduced it with so much éclat. Mr. Joseph Bennett has written a clever analysis of the sonata, the 29th in order of composition, and written at Mödling in the summer of 1818. He notes the same power, the same solemnity, the same largeness of treatment, and the same difficulties as in the 9th (Choral) symphony. Mr. Bennett also points out to admirers the "brief fantastic" presto that intrudes upon the scherzo, the "astonishing and far extending adagio, too big for words"; the short indecisive largo, and the final fugue "with some licenses," called by Lenz "a nightmare"! Dr. Hans von Bülow's reading of this sonata at St. James's Hall, some years ago, will not be forgotten, but Mr. Bonawitz has every reason to be proud of his achievement. Other pieces were much applauded, particularly the Fantasie of Mozart, one of Schumann's, Op. 17 (first movement), and Chopin's Fantasia in F minor. M. Saint-Saëns was well represented by an "Etude de Rhythme," and Liszt humbly appeared as a "transcriber"; Wagner's "Festspiel und Brautlied" (Festival Play and Bridal Song) from "Lohengrin." Weber's Rondo in E flat is a remarkably pretty and sprightly piece, by schoolgirls often assassinated. The selections from Couperin, Rameau, Scarlatti, and old Sebastian were bonnes bouches for the connoisseurs and musical antiquaries. The fourth and last recital is fixed for Dec. 5th. The scheme of Nov. 21st is subjoined: Andante in A minor (Frohberger), (1637-1701); "Le Reveil-Matin" (Couperin), (1668-1733); "Le Tambourin" (Rameau), (1683-1764); "Tempo di Ballo" (Scarlatti), (1683-1757); Fugue in C minor (Bach), (1685-1750); Allemande in F minor (Handel), (1685-1759); Fantasie (from Fantasia and Sonata in C minor) (Mozart), (1756-1791); Sonata, Op. 106, in B flat (Beethoven), (1770-1827); Rondo in E flat major (Weber), (1786-1826); "Momens musicaux" (Schubert), (1797-1828); Scherzo a Capriccio (Mendelssohn), (1809-1847); Fantasia, Op. 17 (first movement in C major (Schumann), (1810-1856); and Fantasia in F minor (Chopin), (1809-1849). The works of living composers were as follows: "Etude de Rhythme" (St. Saëns); Jagstück (Reinecke); Toccata in G minor (Walter Macfarren); "Festpiel und Brautlied" from "Lohengrin" (Wagner-Liszt).

HIGH WYCOMBE.

On Monday evening, the 19th ult., the Choral Association gave their first concert of the season in the Town Hall to a large audience, many being unable to gain admission. The following excellent scheme formed the programme :—

Overture, "Rosamunde"..... Schubert.
Song, "The distant shore"..... Sullivan.
Concerto in D minor (Pianoforte and Orchestra).... Mendelssohn.
Song, "Bid me discourse" ..... Bishop.
Part-song, "Good night, thou glorious sun" ..... Smart.
Sinfonia Cantata, "The Hymn of Praise" ..... Mendelssohn.

Conductor - - - MR. J. G. WRIGLEY, Mus.Bac., Oxon.

Mendelssohn's glorious cantata was, of course, the chief attraction; of the work itself I need not write, but will simply content myself with recording an admirable performance. The soloists, Miss Fenna and Mr. Kenningham were in splendid form, and did full justice to their share of the work. The duet, "My song shall be always thy mercy," deserves, however, special mention, both voices blending perfectly. With the exception of one or two slight slips, the small but excellent orchestra did the work well, the long and trying symphony being played with great spirit and much taste. The chorus, however, carried off the honours of the evening; their singing throughout was worthy of the very highest praise. In "Ye nations" the fire and enthusiasm thrown by all into this finale was a feature not soon to be forgotten. The short selection calls for very few words. Mr. J. G. Wrigley gave a brilliant performance of the Concerto, and was warmly applauded at the close. Both vocalists were recalled after the songs. Mr. W. A. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was at the piano, and conducted the band for the concerto in a quiet but steady manner. The next concert is announced for February 25th, 1884, when Mozart's "Requiem" will be given for the first time here.

WEST LONDON TABERNACLE.

A meeting was held on Nov. 23rd at the West London Tabernacle, St. James's Square, Notting Hill, for the purpose of hearing the first of a new organ which has just been added to the edifice.

The Right Hon. Sir CHARLES DILKE, who presided, after congratulating the congregation on the possession of the instrument, spoke as follows: I think we may be proud in England of the general progress which has been made in Church music in modern times. We have not in the past, of whatever else we may be used to boast, been given to boasting of ourselves as a musical nation. Perhaps we have rather hidden our light under a bushel in this regard, for I doubt whether English music has not been always better than its European reputation. As regards Church music this has been the case, and in this particular branch of Church music, viz., organ music, we stand altogether before the rest of the known world. I have heard a good deal of ecclesiastical music in various portions of the civilised world, and have often attended religious services in places where the music is supposed to be before that which we can offer in this country. Now I will undertake to say that the music, generally speaking, of the Roman Catholic Church, of which so much is said, is better probably in this country than it is in other portions of Europe. The music of the Greek and Russian branches of the Eastern Church is often supposed to be better than any of the other ecclesiastical music which can be found in the world. It is very difficult, and that difficulty which separates it from the ecclesiastical music of the rest of Europe has in itself a certain charm. In the music of the Eastern Church there is, as a rule, all through the empire of Russia, a complete absence of all instrumental music; they trust entirely to the human voice, more especially to bass male voices, and that singing of the old 5th century chants by bass voices alone in the Greek and Russian Churches is a very striking feature of the worship of the Eastern Church. It is extremely beautiful, but I don't think that musicians would place it on a level with the ecclesiastical music of Western Europe. If we can stand our own here in this country, as against the ecclesiastical music which is offered to us by other churches in this country, we are not in fear of comparison even with the Eastern Church. I will undertake to say that the English composers of church music of the last 200 years have stood second to no composers of ecclesiastical music in the world, as seen in modern times. By the popularisation of Church music in this country, by oratorios, and by the labours of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the other societies which have followed in its steps, we can fairly claim to have done as much for Church music as can be claimed by any country in the world. Our own colonies and the United States have followed close behind us in the popularisation of ecclesiastical music, but I think they will still admit that we stand in front of them in the matter. I hope I have established the claim that we in England stand, as far as ecclesiastical music is concerned, altogether in the front rank. Sir Charles Dilke concluded by appealing for subscriptions towards the expenses consequent on the erection of the organ. During the evening Mr. E. H. Turpin gave a recital on the new instrument, and various anthems were rendered by the church choir. On leaving, Sir Charles received a hearty vote of thanks, which was moved by the Rev. W. T. Moore, the pastor.

Sir Charles Dilke certainly deserves to be congratulated upon his bold, manly, and just standing up for English music; and it is to be hoped his attitude in this regard will be followed by other speakers of eminence. The organ, built by Mr. H. Wedlake, of Berkley Road, Regent's Park, has two manuals and pedal. The instrument is of good tone, admirably voiced; the wind chests are fitted with Wedlake's improved light touch valves, which yield a pleasant elastic touch, to judge from the instrument now noticed. The diapason work of the instrument was found to be even and solid, and the instrument was in every way highly satisfactory.

GLASGOW.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company has just concluded a fortnight's engagement at the Royalty Theatre. The only novelties produced were Mackenzie's "Colomba" and Thomas's "Esmeralda." The latter obtained by far the most popularity, both by reason of its more interesting story and lighter music. The scholarly and powerful work of Mr. Mackenzie was hailed by musicians with every feeling of pleasure, and the event of its production is regarded as an honour to Scotland's music. Musical and other journals are quite wrong in stating that "Colomba" is the first opera ever written by a Scotchman. John Thomson, at one time Professor of Music in Edinburgh University, produced an opera entitled "Hermann, or the Broken Spear," and W. Vincent-Wallace was more Scotch than Irish. Both Thomson and Mackenzie have been hampered by poor librettos.

The first concert of the Choral Union takes place on Dec. 4th, the programme consisting of works by Cherubini, Cowen, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Wagner, and Delibes. Miss Robertson is the vocalist.

Mr. A. L. Grigor, organist and choirmaster, Glasgow, has prepared a work entitled "Hints and Maxims for Players on Keyed Instruments," which will shortly be published by Messrs. Porteous Brothers, 43, Renfield Street. The book will include, in addition to the practical instructions, musical sketches of Carlisle, Dunblane, and Lucerne Cathedrals; other original articles and anecdotes, and hints on Scotch music and how to play it. The book is particularly adapted for performers on the pianoforte, harmonium, American organ, etc., and will be illustrated by musical examples, and an engraving of St. Cecilia at the organ.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

It is ever a genuine pleasure to write about the University Choral Society, whose opening concert for the season took place on 24th November in the Examination Hall of Trinity College at 2 o'clock, long before which hour every available space in the building was completely occupied. It does not frequently happen thus in concert rooms; but I would remark, in connection with the University Choral Concerts (and it reflects very creditably on the good taste of the audience), that they enjoy a pleasurable immunity from the annoyance invariably caused at concerts by that unscrupulous class of people who make it a point either to arrive late, or leave early, or perhaps both.

The performance on this occasion was of a miscellaneous character, and included some very pretty and attractive numbers. A special interest was attached to the appearance of two Australian artists, one a pianist (Miss Orr), who delighted her audience with two piano solos—Sonata Appassionata, Op. 57 (Beethoven), and 1. Berceuse; 2. Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53 (Chopin). Miss Orr, on entering the hall, was very warmly received, and at the end of each piece was greeted with well-merited applause; for truly the performance was everything that could be desired. The playing of the Sonata was in every respect a scholarly production, rendered in excellent time, and with a very marked regard for the lights and shades of the composition. The second solo was equally successful, both of which, it may be remarked, Miss Orr played from memory. Our second Australian artist, Miss Mitchell, is gifted with high vocal abilities, combined with that ease, cultivation and style which characterize the true artist. Her voice is a rich mezzo-soprano, of great power and flexibility, both of which qualities were fairly tested by the selection of her songs. A "Recitative ed Aria," by Mercadante, was an excellent piece of vocalism, and was very warmly applauded. Two songs, "Question" and "Answer," written by Sir Robt. Stewart, for Madame Roze, were also given by Miss Mitchell, and in such a manner as to reflect great credit upon both herself and composer, who played her a most graceful accompaniment. Her other selection was "Tried and True," composed especially for her by William Gollmick. The society also secured the services of Mr. Bapty, who contributed in no small degree to the enjoyment of the concert. Two Irish melodies, words by Thomas Moore, have been arranged by the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy, F.T.C.D., and were sung by Mr. Bapty with that grace and finish which distinguishes all his vocalism. The composer, who played the accompaniment, seemed much pleased with the rendering. "Embarrassment," by Franz Abt, was admirably rendered by Mr. Bapty, and the same may be said of his singing in the duet with Miss Mitchell, of Rossini's "Mira la bianca." Mr. Carte, a member of the society, gave a very good rendering of an "Italian boat song," by Tito Mattei. Another member contributed, in a very agreeable manner, "Best of all," a song by F. L. Moir. A lady member gave a very good dramatic interpretation of the aria "Nobil Signor, salute," from "The Huguenots." The last, but by no means the least, I have to notice, with much pleasure, the singing of three part-songs, a madrigal, and a choral ode, all of which were admirably given by the choral. I would select, as specially worthy of praise, the singing of the part-song by Sir George Macfarren, "The Miller."

The society announce, for their next concert in February, Handel's oratorio "Jephtha," with full band and chorus. It may perhaps be of interest to mention that the University Choral Society was founded in 1839, and since that date have brought before its members about sixty works of the first rank, most of which were never previously heard in Dublin. This, I say, is a most creditable record for a society like the "University Choral," and must afford much gratification to the authorities of the Trinity." To the respected conductor, Sir Robt. Stewart, all praise is due for the ability, energy, and judgment he has ever displayed in its advancement.

READING.—The first of two private subscription concerts of instrumental music, was given on Wednesday [illegible], in Messrs. Binfield and Wellings' Concert Room, Reading, under the direction of Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., with Mr. Alfred Gibson as first violin, Mr. E. F. Johns, second violin, Mr. H. M. Dowson, viola, Mr. C. Ould, violoncello, and Mr. F. J. Read, pianoforte. The following was the programme:—Quartet in C minor, No. 4, Op. 18, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (Beethoven); solo violoncello; Quintet in E flat, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello (Op. 44), (Schumann); solo violin; Quartet in G major, Op. 54, No. 1, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (Haydn).

WOLVERHAMPTON FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Monday, Nov. 19th, the above society opened their present season with a highly praiseworthy performance of Gounod's sacred trilogy, "The Redemption." The large and influential audience which was brought together by this, the second, performance of the above work, fully justified the committee in their experiment of a repetition of this work at so short a period of time. The band and chorus, as usual, numbered fully 300, and Dr. Heap, who so highly distinguished himself during the late festival, conducted. The artists engaged for the occasion were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Santley. Miss Larkcom, who was in good voice, sang what little music fell to her share with much taste and expression, the solo, "From thy love as a father," which is associated with a chorus, being very good. Miss Lloyd, a native of Wolverhampton, who received a reception which must have been very gratifying to her, was in splendid voice; indeed, it is doubtful if she has ever been heard with much better effect in her native town than on this occasion, her efforts being marked by a breadth of tone that left little to be desired; she was most effective in the concerted items. Mr. Redfern Hollins seemed to be under the influence of a cold, but he struggled bravely on, and as the evening advanced sang in a manner that greatly pleased his audience. Mr. Santley's singing in this work has been so fully written upon that it only remains to be said that he was quite up to his usual form, his delivery of the "Last Words from the Cross," being marked by all the solemnity and pathos the occasion demanded. Of the singing and playing of the band and chorus, upon whom the lion's share of the work falls, praise is due, the choruses, "Unfold ye portals," and "The word is flesh become," being almost perfect models of chorus singing. The band was most effective throughout, but they especially distinguished themselves in the "earthquake" and the "darkness" portions. Mdme. Priscilla Frost was harpist on the occasion, and rendered valuable aid. Dr. Heap was, as usual, a splendid conductor, and much of the success of the concert is due to his untiring efforts for the advancement of the society. As showing the advance the society has made, 100 members have been invited to take part in a performance of "The Redemption" in Birmingham next month.

HORNS' ASSEMBLY ROOMS.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 14th, Miss Haidée Lockhart gave her annual concert at the above rooms. The programme, which was rather long, included some attractive performances, among which may be mentioned a pianoforte selection, admirably played by Miss Lockhart, and two harp solos by Miss Adelaide Arnold, R.A.M. Songs were given by Miss Annie Williams, Mr. A. T. Layton, Mr. Geo. F. Grover, and others.—The second of a series of six smoking concerts, under the direction of Mr. Geo. F. Grover, was given here on Wednesday evening, Nov. 21st, to a crowded audience, which seemed thoroughly to enjoy and appreciate the programme provided. Mr. Geo. E. Fairchild, the well known reciter, met with a hearty reception, while many well known vocalists sang, and in most cases their efforts were successful. Messrs. R. G. Pitt and Geo. F. Grover presided at the piano during the evening.

LYNE, CHERTSEY.—Mr. Fred. Monk, organist of Lyne, and choirmaster of Christ Church, Long Cross, gave an evening concert in the school on Friday, Nov. 16, when he was assisted by Mr. Richard Blagrove, of H.M. private band, &c., and by his sons, Masters Stanley and Arthur Blagrove. Mr. Dyved Lewis, silver medallist of the Royal Academy of Music, also took part, as did several lady amateurs resident in the neighbourhood. The first movements from Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 11, and of Mozart's Quartet in G minor, together with Regondi's "Les Oiseaux," and two of Molique's "Flying Leaves" for concertina, finely played by Mr. Blagrove; Handel's Sonata in A for violin, contributed by Master Stanley Blagrove; and Mendelssohn's Romance for 'cello, by Master Arthur Blagrove; the beneficiare taking pianoforte part in trio and quartet, in addition to several of the accompaniments during the evening, and singing (by desire) an old English ballad. Mr. Dyved Lewis gave, in admirable style, Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud." Mrs. Monk sang Spohr's song, "The Bird and Maiden," with concertina obbligato by Mr. Blagrove, and of the other items of the programme—Mrs. Berner in some German songs by Curschmann; and an effective song, "Hearken, O children of men," by Alice Boston; Miss Ritchie in Smart's "Lady of the Lea," and a ballad by Wellings; and Mrs. Berner's and Mrs. Bramwell in Bendall's duet, "A little bird sat on a tree"—each deserved the reception accorded by the crowded audience.

Some curious mistakes have arisen from the simultaneous announcements of two series of German operas. The Covent Garden season will be conducted by Herr Anton Seidl, not by Herr Richter, as stated by some journals. The last-named conductor will direct Herr Franke's enterprise, for which it is hoped Her Majesty's Theatre will be secured.

THE MANDOLINE.

In the "City of Flowers" there exists one of the quaintest orchestras known to the musical world. It consists almost exclusively of stringed instruments played upon with the plectrum, and is the outcome of a social movement for the revivification of the moribund mandoline. This movement was set on foot two or three years ago by a small number of Florentine gentlemen, fanatici per la musica, who had made up their minds that the mandoline was the national instrument of Italy, and, as such, must be "revived," cultivated, and popularised. The notion found favour in Tuscan society, and soon an association was formed of nearly a hundred members—mostly executants—under the title of "Il Circolo Margherita di Mandolinisti." An excellent local musician, Professor Graziani-Walter, was induced to undertake the training of the members in ensemble playing and to direct their concerted performances; numerous attractive morceaux were arranged for the Circolo's special class of instruments and assiduously practised; finally, a full orchestra (from the mandolinist point of view) of over fifty performers was got together and untiringly manipulated by its accomplished leader until it attained a remarkably high degree of efficiency. The Margherita Association has now a large repertoire, including several classical works as well as many effective operatic selections and pièces d'occasion, specially composed for it by Tuscan maestri. It has, moreover, acquired so tremendous a local reputation that, fired by ambition, it aspires to make itself known in the flesh abroad, and, more particularly, to visit these shores. Pourparlers, we believe, have already been exchanged between London and Florence with a view to bringing about the appearance of the mandoline orchestra on the platform of a metropolitan concert-room early in the musical season of 1884. Should these negotiations lead to the desired result, we shall hear the Florentine mandolinists next spring. Meanwhile, it may interest readers to learn how the stringed band of the Circolo Margherita is composed. Mandolines and instruments ejusdem generis form the staple of the orchestra, constituting a stringed quartet of first and second mandoline, corresponding to the violins of an ordinary composite band, and mandole of alto and high tenor pitches, nearly covering between them the compass of the viola. The lower viola compass is represented by guitars—that of the violoncello by lutes of rich and powerful tone. A harp supplies the deeper bass sounds, and lends variety of tone-colour to the ensemble. For absolutely indispensable wind effects, a harmonium is used, and a pair of drums completes the tale of extraneous instrumental elements admitted to the orchestra of the Circolo Margherita, four-fifths of which (taking its average strength at fifty executants) are composed of strings played upon with plectra. The mandola, or mandoline, resembles the half of a huge pear much more closely than the almond, from which it is said to derive its name. All its strings are in pairs. In the smaller or so-called Neapolitan mandolines, there are four pairs; in the larger, or Milanese variety, there are five, tuned in fourths and sixths, instead of in fifths like the former. The lutes of the Circole are thirteen stringed instruments, for the most part yielding broad and mellow sounds, and in some cases exhibiting on their portly backs veritable chefs-d'œuvre of marqueterie, being richly and fancifully inlaid with ivory, precious woods, mother-of-pearl, and silver. Indeed, all the instruments administered to with the plectrum—a slip of tortoiseshell or whalebone when affected to the mandola, while that used with the lute is an eagle or ostrich-quill—are remarkably decorative. Not uncommonly their sounding boards are adorned with paintings of great artistic merit, and the pecuniary value of ancient lutes by celebrated hands (such as Lucas Maler, of Bologna), is scarcely less considerable than that of a Cremona violin.—The Lute.

At the funeral service of the late Sir W. Siemens in Westminster Abbey, on the 26th, the music included Dr. Bridge's anthem, "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom," composed originally for Charles Darwin's funeral, the hymn "Now the labourer's task is o'er," and the "Dead March" in "Saul."

A concert was given at the Boys' School Room, Gloucester Street, Queen Square, W.C., on Nov. 27th, under the direction of Mr. A. W. Constantine, in aid of the St. George the Martyr Organ Improvement Fund. The artists included Miss Reymond, Miss Gillington, Miss Mabel Scanlan, Mr. A. Hawkes, Mr. Robert Bell, Mr. J. A. Doyle, Mr. F. Northcott, Mr. Walter Hann, and the choir of St. George the Martyr. The programme was a well selected miscellaneous one, and it is to be hoped the proceeds of the concert amounted to a solid sum. The musical portions of the services at St. George the Martyr are so well rendered, and the choir so carefully trained by the much esteemed organist, Mr. A. W. Constantine, that those who attend the church and those who take an interest in the advance of church music everywhere, will be doing good by contributing to the fund for the improvement of the organ.

THE VOICE
MUSICALLY AND MEDICALLY CONSIDERED.

BY
ARMAND SEMPLE, B.A., M.B., Cantab., M.R.C.P., Lond.
Physician to the Royal Society of Musicians.

The pupil during study should never go beyond, in the chest register, the notes Mi (E) Fa (F) no matter how high her voice is capable of ascending in that register.

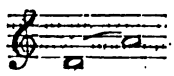
The Falsetto and Head Registers.

The notes from Re (D) to La (A)



are occasionally difficult to fix, from their excessive feebleness. Under these circumstances, it is useful to find some easier sound of the same register, necessarily a higher one, and then to make the voice descend with a well marked slur to the note at which the difficulty was encountered. If the sounds referred to are notably weak and veiled, Signor Garcia recommends, as the best method to brighten them, to attack each in succession on the Italian vowels A, E, I, O, U,* by a short and energetic articulation of the glottis, thus—

When the sounds are thin and child-like in quality, which often happens, this fault may be obviated by arching the soft palate, i.e., by employing the closed timbre with the Italian vowel A, half O, or Aw.

This arching must sometimes be extended to the highest notes of the falsetto register, Do (C) sharp and Re (D) for when not rounded, too great a contrast is apparent between them and the first notes of the head, viz.: Mi (E) flat, Mi (E), and Fa (F) which are clear and round. The arched position of the pharynx, and the contraction of the glottis is productive of this full and pure character, which may be communicated to all the preceding notes by the employment of similar means. The falsetto and head registers may be rendered equal by exactly the same method. All sounds of the head register below Re (D) are useless, since by this register the breath is rapidly exhausted. The great attribute of the head voice is roundness. This register is sometimes thin, either from the youth of the singer, or from want of skill; in the first case, age alone will remedy the defect; in the latter case it may be remedied by directing the voice towards the top of the pharynx; but no note above Sol (G) should ever be attempted. Nothing ruins a voice so rapidly as the injudicious employment of high sounds. One of the greatest errors is to imagine that high sounds are lost for want of practice. In every case, no matter how high the pitch of the individual voice, the high notes should be treasured and economised with the greatest care, and never until the throat has attained considerable flexibility, should the limits above indicated be exceeded; again, the more firm sustaining power is acquired in the middle notes of the voice, so are the high notes strengthened in a corresponding degree. It is not by sustained notes that a trial should be made, but by vocal passages. Each note mastered should have sufficient time given it to become firm before attempting the next. During this process, the formation of the throat, of necessity, undergoes certain alterations or modifications, and it cannot suddenly become firm and capable of sustaining sounds.

LIVERPOOL.

Two organ recitals were given in St. George's Hall, on Saturday, November 24th, by Mr. W. T. Best. The following were the programmes:—

AFTERNOON.

Fantasia in E flat major (Op. 54)	Brosig.
Andante from the 4th Symphony	Mozart.
Prelude and Fugue in E major	Bach.
Hymn, "Il Sol, la Luna, e le Stelle"	Bellini.
Scherzo for the organ in B major	Rinck.
Overture, "Si j'étais Roi"	Adam.

EVENING.

Overture, "Preciosa"	Weber.
Duet, "Quis est homo" ("Stabat Mater"):	Rossini.
Introduction and Fugue in D major	Mozart.
Andante Religioso, and Scherzo Symphonique	Lemmens.
Trio for Flutes and Harp ("L'Enfance du Christ")	Berlioz.
Finale, Allegro Vivace in A minor	Marshall.

BRIXTON.

An organ recital was given on Tuesday, November 27th, in St. Matthew's Church, by Mr. Best, on the opening of the organ. The following was the programme:—

Anthem, "O taste and see"	Goss.
Grand Concerto in D minor	Handel.
Andante—Aria—Fuga.
Trio for Flutes and Harp	Berlioz.
Organ Sonata, No. 3, in A major	Mendelssohn.
Con moto maestoso—Andante Tranquillo.
"By the waters of Babylon" ("From Judah's Captivity")	Shinn.
Siciliana and Fugue	Bach.
Christmas Pastorale	Moriconi.
Hymn	Ancient.
Rondo de Campanelli (Bell Rondo)	Morandi.
"Festal March"	Best.

The organ, by Lewis, is a fine and effective instrument.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist on November 24th, when the hall was filled, as is happily the usual experience upon these occasions. The organ solos were, overture, "Jessonda" (Spohr); Andante (Wagner), and Gavotte (Salieri); Fantasia (J. S. Bach); and Prelude and Fugue (J. E. Eberlin); Fantasia on a Theme by Weber (E. H. Turpin), and Hungarian March, "Faust" (Berlioz). Miss Clara Myers made a satisfactory first appearance at these recitals. Her first song, "Little Wanderers," by E. Philp, was excellently sung, and the young lady, who has a sympathetic contralto voice and a dramatic style, was recalled. There is an effective organ obbligato part to this song. Miss Myers sang songs, by Marzials and M. Wellings, with success. Signor Erba played with much taste and skill the violin solos, Reverie (Vieuxtemps), "Les Abeilles" (Bazzini), in which he was encored, and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen," loudly applauded. To-night, M. Guilmant is the soloist, with a very interesting programme; and Miss Eleanor Rees is the vocalist. Mr. Henry Rose will be the organist on December 8th. On December 15th, Dr. Bridge will introduce two of Handel's concertos, with the original string parts; a very interesting programme may, therefore, be expected. Very satisfactory progress has been made with the arrangements for the rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," on December 20th, under Mr. McNaught's direction. It is said, Mozart's "Requiem," and Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," will be given presently.

Selection, "The Holy City"	Gaul.

WEST CROYDON.

An organ recital was given in the Congregational Church, Campbell Road, Broad Green, on November 27th, by Mr. W. J. Winbolt, whose playing was excellent and duly admired. The programme included :—

Andante in F	Batiste.
Prelude and Fugue in G	Mendelssohn.
Andante, "Evening Prayer"	Smart.
Pastorale by Kullak, arranged by Best.
Andante from the 3rd Symphony	Haydn.
Grand Chœur in A	Salomé.

Vocal performances were given by Miss Evelyn Bawtree Mrs. Dalgliesh (both ladies sang effectively), Messrs. S. S. Scott, Savage, and Underwood.

LIVERPOOL.

The sixth series of organ recitals were given in the Church of St. Margaret, Prince's Road, by H. A. Branscombe, on Saturday, November 3rd. The programme of the seventh recital included :—

Largo in F	Bach.
Concert-Variationen	Meyer.
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Fuga.
Barcarolle	Bennett.
Concerto in G	Bach.
Allegro—Grave—Presto.

Fantasia, "The Storm"	Lemmens.
"Festive March"	Smart.

A collection was made on behalf of the fund for effecting improvements in the position of the organ and choir.

BOLTON.

An organ recital was given in the Albert Hall, by Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., on Saturday, November 24th The following was the programme :—

Overture, "Der Freischütz"	Weber.
Serenade, "L'enfance du Christ"	Berlioz.
Marche Funebre et Chant Seraphique	Guilmant.
Fantasia in F major	Best.
Gavotte in F	Blakeley.
Romanza, "Rose, softly blooming"	Spohr.
March of the Israelites	Costa.

SEAFORD.

An organ recital was given at St. Leonard's Church, on Sunday, November 25th, by Mr. A. H. Day. The following was the programme :—

Sonata No.	Mendelssohn.
Symphony ("Militaire")	Haydn.
Capucine ("The Monastery")	Kullak.
March	Deane.
"The Storm"	Lemmens.

READING.

Mr. I. C. B. Tirbutt gave an organ recital at the Town Hall, on Thursday afternoon, November 22nd, in connection with a Chrysanthemum Show, held in the adjoining Hall. The following was the programme :—

Overture in E minor	Morandi.
Andante	Batiste.
"Let the bright Seraphim"	Handel.
Marche Solennelle	Gounod.
"Hymn of Nuns"	Wely.
Entr'act, "Rosamunde"	Schubert.
Marche Heroique	"

PRESTON.

Two organ recitals were given on Thursday and Saturday evenings, November 22nd and 24th, by Mr. James Tomlinson, organist of the Corporation, in the New Public Hall. The following were the programmes :—

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22ND.

Andante in F	Smart.
Introduction and Chaconne	Handel.
Airs, with variations	Hiles.
Overture to "Le Pre aux Clercs"	Hérold.
Communion	Grison.

Overture to "Zanetta"	Auber.
Serenade, "Berceuse"	Gounod.
March (Sonata in D)	Lemmens.

The Andante in F (Smart), and Adagio (Beethoven), were rendered with great taste. Mr. Tomlinson secured a well-merited encore for the pleasing manner in which he rendered Gounod's "Serenade Berceuse." There were moderate attendances at both recitals.

DARLINGTON.

The organ at Holy Trinity Church, has been thoroughly repaired and cleaned; new action, and two new stops put in, and was re-opened on Thursday, 22nd November, by Mr. Fred. Tovey, the organist, when he gave the following programme in a very able manner :—

Andante in G	Smart.
St. Anne's Fugue	Bach.
Andante in F	Wely.
"The arm of the Lord"	Haydn.
Sonata in A minor	Morandi.
Andante in D	Mendelssohn.
First Organ Concerto	Handel.
March	Ouseley.

The organ has three manuals and pedal, and some thirty-eight stops. The whole of the work has been carefully done by Messrs. Peter Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield.

WOODBERRY DOWN, N.

An organ recital was given by Mr. Fountain Meen, at Woodbury Down Chapel, Seven Sisters' Road, on Tuesday evening, November 20th. The programme included :—

Postlude in D	Smart.
Canzone	Guilmant.

Chorus, "Fixed in His Everlasting Seat"	Handel.
Air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth"	Bach.
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor	Bach.
"War March of Priests" ("Athalie")	Mendelssohn.

The organ at Great Stanmore, Herts, has been rebuilt by Mr. Hedgeland, of Wrotham Road, Camden Town, the cost, £400, having been defrayed by a friend of the organist (Mr. A. Collam). The instrument has two manuals, pedal, and twenty-eight stops.

A RUIN AND A MONUMENT.

Our "Old Reporter," discourses at large on the "MUSICAL UNION," directed, for nearly forty years, by Professor John Ella. The tribute of praise awarded to this venerable musician would not be grudged by the veriest gradgrind. Mr. Ella, in founding his "MUSICAL UNION," prepared and made ready the way, so to speak, for such institutions as the "Monday Popular Concerts" and classical chamber music in general, once discarded as dry, but now almost hunted after by all intellectual and highly educated members of society. Mr. Ella not only inspired the very backward "British public" with a taste for the quartets and sonatas of Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, but was the happy "medium" of introducing the most eminent celebrities of the continent, Vieuxtemps, Ernst, Auer, Joachim, Rubinstein, Lubeck, Von Bülow, Jaell, Mdme. Schumann —in a word, "all the talent" of the wide world.

The "Old Reporter" has described the interesting re-unions of the MUSICAL UNION, which were held, for a time, at Willis's Rooms, but latterly in St. James's Hall. Why, it will be impatiently asked, is the "MUSICAL UNION" no more? I could give an answer, but would rather be reticent. Mr. Ella might have carried on the concern prosperously as before, had not age and infirmities compelled his retirement from the office of director. He unfortunately failed to find an equally efficient successor, and a collapse was inevitable. To take up the baton of Professor Ella was something like undertaking to lead the Imperial Guard onwards to victory after the fall of Napoleon. The termination of a glorious career, from A.D. 1845 to A.D. 1881, is not the less to be mourned.

This article is penned whilst the passing bell tolls the departure of Lord Overstone. The Times, full of "City" business, and with little thought beyond money-making and the art of getting rich, makes no mention of Lord Overstone's well-known devotion to music. The "Old Reporter" knows better. Year after year, this great banker and sound financier was to be seen in regular attendance not only at the meetings of the "MUSICAL UNION," but also at the Monday Popular Concerts, and the afternoon recitals of Mr. Charles Hallé.

Of late years, Lord Overstone was carried into the hall on an easy chair, and safely seated on a front bench. What a lesson for millionaires! Other old men, after money-grubbing and gambling all day in Capel Court or Mincing Lane, go home to their grass "feods" and after dinner sleep. Here was to be found a great banker, a nonagenarian, doing his duty in the City, drawing up valuable financial statements, giving literally sterling advice to possible Chancellors of the Exchequer, and then airing his mind, in higher and Empyrean regions by listening to the divine inspirations of the great German masters!

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann announces two pianoforte recitals for Dec. 10th and 19th. Mdme. Montigny-Rémaury, the pet pianist of the Parisians, and always a lionne at the Musical Union of London, holds out her magnetic hands to the public with a pressing invitation to the Prince's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 12th.

It is to be hoped that "La Messe des Morts" of Berlioz, will be repeated at the Crystal Palace after Christmas, and also performed by Mr. Barnby at the Albert Hall. Mr. Manns has fixed a rather unfortunate day for the second performance at Sydenham—so late in the year, when Londoners find the journey most inconvenient. The railway train service is not the most efficient.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

NOW that the Annual Promenade Concerts have become a recognised institution of the London off-season, it is not out of place to consider the position and possibilities of what must be regarded as the only means of orchestral exposition, so to speak, the mass of the people can lay claim to. Like most English institutions, the Promenade Concert is liable to be built up too long upon the lines which formed the basis of its first success. Perhaps in some respects there has been even a backward tendency, as in the development of the "lounge" idea, the increase of refreshment appliances, and the persistent employment of the military band as an exciting adjunct to the civil or legitimate orchestra. Of course it is perfectly clear that when large capital is employed, popular support will be eagerly sought for. All the same it is time to ask the plain questions, are the intelligent lovers of music in the minority still? are the requirements of the thoughtless loungers to be ever paramount? or is it not high time to assert more definitely the claims and power of high class orchestral music. The questions may be considered, without overlooking in any way the good work already achieved by the management on the best interests of the art. There are, it may be contended, distinct signs of the largely increased strength of those who love good sound music, and the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon the admirable renderings of classical music by the (new) orchestra under Mr. A. G. Crowe's beat, ought to be taken as sure evidence of solid growth in public taste. On the other hand, pandering to what is erroneously known as popular taste is liable, by being taken for a disposition to play into the hands of the loungers, to increase a tendency to rowdyism more or less unmanageable, and to incline, orderly, quiet admirers of sterling music to withhold their support.

It is but logical to conclude that a fine orchestra can only properly be employed upon the performance of high class works, and therefore the more frequent rendering of such works should be the constantly increasing desire of all interested in the welfare of these concerts. It is further a logical conclusion to suppose that a majority of those who have taste and discrimination enough to desire to listen to a good orchestra, would further desire to hear such a body of capable performers employed to the best possible advantage. Then a profound mistake is made as regards the provision made by good composers for the exercise of the different emotions of the human mind. Just as we know that no humour exceeds in pungency that of CHAS. DICKENS, that no wit can excel that of SHAKESPEARE, so we know that the London Journal cannot afford so much real enjoyment even in the less exalted literary line as has been supplied by our greatest writers. So in music the most lively [illegible] has not made as much fun and sparkle [illegible] as may be found in one of BEETHOVEN'S or MENDELSSOHN'S scherzo movements. Nay, just as ordinary witticisms are more or less ponderous and dreary as compared with the sparkle of a real diamond in words from a master mind, so the vapid, clumsy rhythmical monotony of a vulgar dance tune, even when its accents are emphasized by the deafening clang of a military band, falls far short of real life and elasticity when heard in proximity to a brilliant Allegro from the hand of a great Symphony writer. The import of these observations is the hope that the Promenade Concert management will be able to offer more good music and to place more and more faith in the better and growing artistic impulses of their audiences and to check the noisy, rowdy, vulgar calls for the commonplace music by unthinking loungers, by declining to pander to their tastes and requirements. The management may also remember that to strive to improve the class of one's customers is a sound common sense business axiom. The direction of the concerts have all the requisite experience and machinery for placing their performances upon the highest artistic basis. Their doing this will now secure a large and solid support and save them probably much trouble in learning the difficult science of mob management. The expression of such hopes as these results from the grateful acknowledgment of much good already done by the excellent performances during the last and previous seasons.

E. H. TURPIN.

TOUCH IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING.

Few of us perhaps think much of that truly wonderful act, the conveyance of every shade of feeling through wood and various mechanisms by the sense of touch to the strings of the pianoforte. The exercise of touch in this way is so familiar that, like many other wonderful yet familiar processes, neither player or listener pauses to speculate upon this one of the most subtle and delicate of mechanical contrivances. However, we are all critical more or less with regard to the "touch" provided by the skilled pianoforte maker and the highly trained sensitive finger actions of the performer. The subject might be greatly enlarged upon, but for the present at any rate I only propose to throw out a practical suggestion in connection with the formation or acquiring of a "touch" which may lead to mastery over this power—without which there can be no eloquence on the part of the pianist—it may be useful to point out that much depends upon the touch of the fingers upon the keys. Without going now into a consideration of the many different powers exercised in this direction by fingers and wrist acting separately or in combination, in legato or staccato passages, I would advise the student to systematically employ the fingers with a slightly varying elongation, from the position in which striking with a soft, sharp blow straight down from the knuckles, the fingers produce a bright, hard sound, to a position where pressure from the fingers stretched forward, firmly, yet gently pressing the keys, and producing a prolonged, vocal sustained tone. Between the straight down attack of the fingers and the soft, full pressure of the extended fingers, the different shades of touch and tone may be found. The subject will probably invite further attention.

E. H. TURPIN.

PROSPECTS OF THE NEXT OPERA SEASON.

People accustomed often ask the question, "What sort of (musical) season the world of London is likely to have in 1883—84?" A remarkably good one, it may be replied, with respect to opera, almost too good to be true. A weekly columnist, writing on an easy chair and with little beyond money-making and the art of getting rich, makes no mention of Lord Overstone's well-known devotion to music. The "Old Regime" is not only at the meetings of the Political Economy Club, but also at the Monday Popular Concerts, and the Philharmonic, and the Crystal Palace, and the Richter concerts, and the Saturday Popular Concerts, and spring, before the beginning of the regular Italian season. Good news for musicians pure and simple. The fashionable dilettanti who engage boxes as a matter of worldly business, because it is the "proper" thing, will have their innings after Easter; meanwhile the German troupe are to occupy the field and to make hay whilst the sun shines. We may expect a goodly répertoire of sterling, standard, classical operas, supported, as at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1882, by an efficient corps, that is to say, a galaxy of glittering orbs, without individually prominent "stars." Above all, the public may here enjoy a feast of good music without the payment of monstrous fancy prices. In Germany itself, the finest works of the great masters are to be heard, as at Dresden, Munich, Leipsic, and other large towns every night in the year, at the cost of a few shillings, and at comparatively early hours. It need hardly be added that the works of WAGNER are likely to be made much of at Covent Garden.

Herr FRANKE, director of the Richter concerts, also comes forward with a promising scheme of opera, on the non-exclusive, or cosmopolitan, principle. The financial failure of the splendid undertaking at Drury Lane in 1882, when "Die Meistersinger" first rejoiced the hearts of the realistic Londoners, has not discouraged the enterprising manager. The locus in quo remains to be found, for it is reported that the theatre so well used by Herr RICHTER and his company nearly two years ago, will not be available for the purpose of Herr FRANKE. Means, however, are never wanting when a good man has resolved upon a sensible step. A palace of Aladdin would be raised for Herr FRANKE by money magic, one might hope, rather than allow so excellent a project to fall through from merely mechanical difficulties.

Mr. CARL ROSA has already gained his footing throughout the country, and intends to keep it. All lovers of genuine opera regret that he can only arrange to visit London for so short a time in the year. Last spring, the season at Drury Lane only lasted a month; The two new English operas, by A. GORING THOMAS and Mr. A. C. MACKENZIE, unquestionably deserved their success. Let room be made for all; but the world wills, with all the "heart, mind, and soul" of a SCHOPENHAUER, to cultivate a still closer acquaintance with "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Der Fliegende Holländer," and even "Rienzi." "Die Meistersinger" "Tristan "und Isolde" have not yet been mounted by Mr. CARL ROSA in London. Mdme. MARIA ROZE, the (foreign) prima donna of the company, has lately achieved a series of triumphs in the provinces, and will be heard with all sympathy and admiration at Drury Lane. The excellent representative of "Co- "lomba," too, is a second tower of strength and a great favourite.

So much, then, for the season of the Bissextile year of grace, 1884. Three courses of opera, opera foreign, and "opera in English;" the old Italian Opera, nine Richter concerts, and the six Philharmonics, with capital Crystal Palace entertainments up to June, should satisfy even the most exacting lover of music. The popular concerts of Mr. ARTHUR CHAPPELL are permanent performances, and stand apart.

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

FIRST EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR IN MUSIC.

This examination will commence on Tuesday, Feb. 5, 1884, at ten o'clock, in the Schools.

Attention is directed to the following clause of the statute (Statt. Univ., Tit. V. (VI.), sect. iii., § 1) relating to this examination:—"Nemini sese examinandum sistere liceat, nisi qui aut Magistris Scholarium aut Examinatoribus in prævia quam vocant examinatione in Universitate Cantabrigiensi satisfecerit, aut testimonium a Delegatis secundum Statutum Tit. XIX. sec. xv. gratis acceperit, aut examinatoribus seniorum candidatorum qui non sunt de corpore Universitatis in literis Anglicis, in Mathematica, in lingua Latina et vel in lingua Græca vel in una saltem lingua moderna (videlicet Gallica vel Germanica vel Italica) satisfecerit: cujus rei testimonium exhibeatur Professori Musicæ."

The names of gentlemen who intend to present themselves will be received by Mr. Geo. Parker, the clerk of the schools, on or before Saturday, Feb. 2, 1884, on payment of the statutable fee of £2. Candidates who are not already members of the University must matriculate before the day of examination.

Subjects of Examination:—Harmony and Counterpoint, in not more than four parts. Text-books—Ouseley's "Treatise on Harmony," and his "Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue."

FREDERICK A. GORE OUSELEY,
Professor of Music.

Oxford, Nov. 20, 1883.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

A "Student's Invitation Concert" was given on Tuesday, the 27th ult. These pleasant entertainments afford the students opportunities of displaying their abilities and progress they are not slow to take advantage of.

The following was the programme:—

A correspondent, temporarily sojourning at Whitby, North Yorkshire, reports the Æolian harp performances, such as they are, of the railway telegraph wires on the cliff. On Monday afternoon, he heard the notes G natural, A natural, and E flat distinctly enunciated; and on Sunday G. The tension of the wires, according to the state of the atmosphere and the pressure of the wind, no doubt, causes a frequent semi-tonic variation in the notes of the scale, but C natural seemed to be a favourite sound.

Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts commenced on the 21st ult. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Mdme. Carlotta Patti, Mdme. Sterling, Miss Damian, Mr. Vernon Rigby (in place of Mr. Edward Lloyd), Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Santley. Only one new song was included in the programme, a little ditty entitled "Swinging," composed by Miss Cecile Hartog, and sung by Miss Davies. Mr. Venables' choir contributed some part music. It may be taken as a sign of the times that ballads occupied little more than half of the programme. Mdme. Néruda played violin solos by Bach, F. Ries, and Wieniawski, and M. de Pachmann gave pieces by Schumann, Chopin, and Henselt.

MR. GEORGE CARTER'S NEW CANTATA.

The following account of Mr. George Carter's new cantata, "The Golden Legend," will be read with interest:—

"The Golden Legend," a new cantata by Mr. George Carter, is constructed and considerably abridged from Longfellow's picturesque poem. It consists of twenty numbers, the principal solo parts being—soprano (Elsie); tenor (Prince Henry); baritone (Walter, a Minnesinger); and basso (Lucifer); there are also minor parts for alto and a second bass. The dramatic form of the work is somewhat altered, to avoid the necessity of so many personages, and "The Angel" is represented by the chorus as "The Spirit of Good," in contradistinction to the influence of Lucifer."

The numerous personages of the original, some twenty-five without counting the Miracle play (here entirely omitted), and the various "voices," "monks," etc., is here reduced to five and a chorus, this at once giving the work a totally different character, by maintaining a special interest in the movements of all concerned. The overture, far from being a "potpourri" of the airs of the work, is designed to represent the general features of the work and introduces the "motives" afterwards developed more fully in some instances, while in others they appear here in full form. This may lay claim to a position in that class of music now usually designated "programme," requiring as it does for its perfect appreciation a knowledge of the composer's intentions. That the work has been intended to afford material for choral societies is evident from the important part the chorus has to perform. The first chorus has some unaccompanied music to the words "It is but the rest of the five," as well as a short and not by any means difficult fugue to the words "With fiendish laughter." They also have the third verse of the Evening Hymn, an elaborate development of the two previous verses, which are in quartet form, for solo voices. Then an anthem for Easter Day, to the words, "This is the day when from the dead our Lord arose," quite suitable for Church purposes, and having accompaniment for organ as well as orchestra, and ending with the words, "Hosanna in the highest," the only addition in reference, other than curtailment, to the exact text of Longfellow, in the whole work. The chorus then appear in quite a different class of music, an unaccompanied part-song. There is also another part-song for men's voices, and the work ends with a choral fugue on the motive of Prince Henry's protestations of love and constancy, the grand climax being the harmonized form of the motive of religious fervour in "Elsie's Prayer."

THE MUSICAL NEEDS OF DERBYSHIRE.

Under the heading of "The Needs of Derbyshire," in the Derby Mercury, article No. V. deals with the musical needs of the county, and is from the pen of Mr. John H. Gower, Mus. Doc., Oxon. Dr. Gower's observations are of general application. In the course of the article are the following words:—

With respect to the more pressing and immediate musical needs of the country, the most important of these is an efficient orchestra. What is lost by the lack of this is not easily calculated. The great symphonies of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Rubinstein, &c., are works known to the local audiences by name only, except to the few who are fortunate enough to hear them performed elsewhere. Orchestral players are very scarce. Why will everybody learn the piano? A few, perhaps, may choose the violin as their instrument, and execute pieces of a showy character fairly well; but they are quite unfit for a desk in the orchestra on account of their ignorance of the rudiments of musical theory.

Again, a concert of classical chamber music is an event of rare occurrence. In the catalogue of such music may be found works no less important than Beethoven's quintets, quartets, and trios, sonatas for pianoforte, sonatas for pianoforte and violin, sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello, and numberless similar and dissimilar compositions by great masters. All the above works may be described as "miniature symphonies"—symphonies written for one, two, three, four, or five instruments. Now, there are no such obstacles in the way of the production of this class of music as those connected with orchestral, and I consider the want of concerts of classical chamber music a slur (musically speaking) which is simply inexcusable.

"The Glee" is essentially English, and, although imitated by foreign writers, has never in their hands reached that standard of excellence with which our own composers have endowed it. The musical societies by whom the accompanied choral works of great English masters are performed with so much success, have unconsciously led to the neglect of the glee, and practically to the disuse of one of the most delightful and beautiful forms of vocal music. We have a rich library of this speciality; yet we are passively consenting to have it literally shelved.

"Music," it is said, "is the handmaid of religion," and England can claim to have given birth to, cultivated, and brought to maturity a still more sublime form of the combination of tone and language—I mean the Anthem. And, associated as this is with that which is held to be most sacred and dear by each one of us, it has a higher claim upon our sympathies than any other. And I say, without reserve, that in the range of cathedral music may be found well-nigh numberless works which stand out as ornaments of the most priceless value to the true world of art. The "King of Instruments," which we are unanimous in agreeing is the grandest and most suitable for the sacred purpose it is called upon to serve, may be found in most churches. Doubtless, it is no easy matter to get a good church choir, partly because surplices necessitate boy trebles and boy altos; and really competent singers fail to see any pleasure in adding the tenor and bass parts to the painfully harsh and unmusical sounds usually to be heard proceeding from the front rows of the choir-stalls of our parish churches. The weekly choir practice, which the national schoolboy is with difficulty induced to attend, is insufficient to ensure that standard of excellence, that mellifluousness of tone, that refinement of pronunciation, so inseparably associated with effective vocalisation.

What I would suggest is that some well-trained society should give annually one concert of anthems and one concert of glees, madrigals, and part-songs. That these would be most interesting, instructive, and enjoyable is beyond all doubt; and the beautiful anthems of our English composers would stand a chance of doing the good in Derby that they have already done in so many cathedral cities. I believe if Derby would take the lead, and bestow the time and trouble requisite for the success of such concerts, other towns would speedily follow the example, and the result would be of incalculable service to the best interests of art.

With regard to the possibilities of organ music, the preludes, toccatas, and fugues of Bach, the concertos of Handel, the sonatas of Mendelssohn and Rheinberger, &c., the works of Rinck and Smart, may possibly be heard occasionally, perhaps on an indifferent organ, and probably during the bustle of a congregation leaving a church. This is a most unsatisfactory state of things. A great and important want is the establishment of regular organ recitals. In many towns there is a borough organist, appointed and paid by the Corporation, whose duty is to give recitals weekly on some public organ, and those entertainments are largely attended and much enjoyed. In London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Preston, and Bolton, lovers of organ music can have their taste gratified. English organs and English organists have long borne the reputation of being amongst the best in Europe.

I have already shown that owing to a marked want of appreciation on the part of the inhabitants, really first-class concerts are the exception rather than the rule. It is, therefore, by the "ordinary concert" that the musical tastes of the people are either improved, elevated, and prepared for better things, or the reverse. And I think the "second class" concerts (if I may be allowed so to designate them in order to distinguish them from those in which all the performers are artists of eminence), are capable of doing great things in musical culture and education; for the great drawback in this respect in "first-class" concerts, viz.: centreing the attention on performers and not on things performed, is, or ought to be, removed, to a great extent. The amateur element naturally predominates at these concerts, which afford an admirable opportunity for the young and inexperienced to make their first appearances, and for old and well-tried hands to keep the rust off. The charitable object to which the funds or proceeds are to be devoted is easily settled, but not so the programme. Here much difficulty is experienced. "Who will sing in the early part of the programme before the audience has settled down to encores?" "And who cares to appear towards the end, when everyone is longing to go home?" These important questions having been decided after much discussion, each performer selects a piece or song which is most likely to "take," not considering the merits of the composition at all, and frequently the result is a selection from the countless and worthless productions which are now flooding the market, to the extreme detriment of the art. This ear-tickling trash is, therefore, advertised and propagated, whilst the sound and good compositions are lying on the top shelves year by year, unknown, unopened, unasked for. Thus what would be the good effect of a concert, if nullified by the harm done in popularising compositions which in a musical country ought never to find a publisher.

In arranging a programme, the following essentials for a good concert should be remembered:—1. That eight pieces of average length in each part is sufficient; "enough is as good as a feast." 2. That musical qualifications take precedence of social. 3. That the advice of some competent professional gentlemen should be taken as to the genuineness of the music selected, and also as to the fitness of any untried performers for the public platform. 4. That the feelings of the 300 or more people constituting the audience be respected equally with those of the single individual whose proffered services it is considered advisable to decline—it is a kindness alike to performers and audience to prevent the possibility of a fiasco. 5. That the audience should be instructed, as well as entertained. 6. That the names of the gross impostors, whose miserable effusions are now being forced upon the public by many musicsellers throughout the country, be never allowed to disgrace the pages of the programme. 7. That the services of a really first-class accompanist should be invariably secured.

Digitized by Google

It may be a good plan, in conclusion, to draw up a form of the musical wants which appear to me to be the more urgent, and they are here presented:—1. An efficient orchestra. 2. More professionals and amateurs to assist the above for the sake of their art, and 3. The town to support it. 4. Symphony concerts. 5. Concerts of classical chamber music, by first rate artists. 6. The Derby and Derbyshire public to patronise them. 7. Good glee and madrigal societies. 8. A concert of anthems, and a concert of glees, madrigals, part songs, &c. 9. A chance of hearing the best English masters in the place of some inferior foreign composers. 10. More attention given to quality than to quantity in the less pretentious concerts. 11. Organ recitals.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Liszt does not propose wintering in Rome, according to his usual custom.

Herr G. A. Heinze, of Amsterdam, has completed a new oratorio, "Saint Vincent de Paul."

Franz Servais has completed the orchestration of his new dramatic work, "Appolonide."

A performance of Gaston Salvayre's opera "Richard III." is in prospect at St. Petersburg.

Anton Rubinstein will give a series of concerts at the Salle Erard, Paris, during the month of February.

The new Court Theatre at Stuttgart was opened on the 16th ult., with a performance of "Zauberflöte."

There are tidings of a young tenor at Copenhagen with an extraordinary voice. The singer is named Torsler.

Xaver Scharwenka was announced to conduct his symphony performed by the Copenhagen Concert Society on Dec. 1st.

Eugene Ysaye, a talented violinist and favourite pupil of Vieuxtemps, has just completed a successful concert tour in Switzerland.

Beethoven's C minor Symphony, the "Vorspiel" to "Tristan," and Reyer's overture "Sigurd," were played at a recent Pasdeloup concert in Paris.

A new national theatre was opened at Prague on Nov. 18th. An opera called "Libussa," written for the occasion by M. Smetana, formed the programme.

The 70th birthday of Verdi was celebrated at San Francisco by a performance of selections from his works, under the direction of Signor Domenico Speranza.

Mr. Theodore Thomas is said to have secured, during his recent visit to Germany, the services of Winkelmann and Scaria, of Vienna, and of Fräulein Merten, of Dresden, for a tour of the United States next spring.

Verdi's revised "Simon Boccanegra" was produced in Paris on Nov. 27th, before a notable audience, including M. Grevy. The critics present, however, do not appear to have been greatly impressed by the music.

The Madrid papers are enthusiastic in their praise of Arrietta's new opera, "San Franco da Siena." The Correspondencia Musica insists that the work (produced on Oct. 27th), marks a new epoch in the annals of the Spanish lyric drama.

M. Vaucorbeil, director of the Paris Opera, announces for 1884, Gounod's "Sapho," the first time of performance for twenty-five years, and to which the composer has added a new act and a new ballet. These interpolations are highly spoken of, and the choruses are being actively rehearsed. "Tabarin," a work in two acts by M. Emile Pessard, is also promised.

"Heil dir im Siegerkanz."—Mr. E. von Kornatzki writes to the Daily News from 4, Beresford-road, Highbury New-park, N.:—The news from Madrid stating that on the arrival of the German Crown Prince the band played, not the German march, but "God Save the Queen," as a mark of special attention to him, is liable to give rise to misapprehension to most people, unless it be pointed out at the same time that the Prussians have, since the time of Frederick William III., adopted the English anthem as their own. The German words commencing as above are a free rendering of the English text.

PURITANISM AND MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In your otherwise able leader of to-day Mr. T. L. Southgate conveys an impression of injustice to a great nation when he speaks of a small body of Dissenters as representing "the average Scotch mind." He also leaves any unenlightened readers ignorant that the only objector—as a class—to the use of instrumental music in public worship is the so-called Free-Kirk, a denomination quite distinct from the State Church of Scotland," which with the U. P. or United Presbyterian body strongly advocates the use of organs and reed organs. Moreover, any one who knows many Free Churchmen is aware that the majority of their laity, and quite 80 per cent. of their clergy are strongly in favour of using organs, whilst many more are neutral. Only recently I had the pleasure of establishing some Episcopal choral services by request of a leading Free-Church elder at his castle in the Highlands—in fact what Mr. Southgate, I regret to see, speaks of as "an amusing exhibition" of intolerance, was really the work of a noisy minority, and as death has lately removed the leader Dr. Begg, even this body of Dissenters will shortly fall in with the march of the army of events. Again, organ builders will tell us that the introduction of organs into Scotland has been anything but "gradual" of late. When I went to Edinburgh there was hardly a Presbyterian Church which possessed an instrument; when I left last year there was hardly one save the Free Kirk which did not. The High Kirk, St. Giles's Cathedral, employs not only a very large four manual organ, but also a choir rendering anthems and services most admirably, as do the soi-disant Cathedrals in Glasgow, Dundee, etc. Instruments in Scotch Churches are now the rule rather than the exception, and the objectors to its use, though defensively noisy, are few and daily diminishing. Mr. Southgate is quite right about money being often a stumbling block; Dr. Begg himself once confessed that organs and musicians were expensive, and would cause reduction of "the preachers' salaries." I can, however, speak from experience, that whilst organ recitals were and are immensely popular, the bag-pipes are seldom heard in Scotch towns. He who would listen to a "skirl" must go to the Highlands, and if he does so he will learn that the "pibroch of Donald Dhu" is, in the fresh mountain air, remarkably effective. I know too well of, and have spent much time in humble endeavours to combat the spirit of intolerance which was formerly shown in Scotland; but I think that a church which has made in five years such marvellous musical progress is deserving of kindly encouragement and should not be confounded with a body of Dissenters who have no claim to represent the Scotch Church, which, by the way, pays as a rule far higher salaries to organists than does the Church of England.

I am, yours obediently,

GEO. ERNEST LAKE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In a leading article last week, Mr. T. L. Southgate says:—"The long-winded discussion that has lately been in progress in Scottish Assemblies as to whether it is lawful to employ Artificial instruments aid to worship—as it is, Quoth has again been again decided in the negative." Happily such is not now the case. At the last Assembly of the Free Church in Scotland, it was decided by a very large majority to allow the use of instrumental music in churches, and, in the Established Church, organs have been in use for more than twenty years; in fact it is the exception and not the rule to find an Established Church without an organ; and, as £200 to £1500 is not an unusual price to give for an organ, the "bawbee" (to again quote Mr. Southgate), can hardly be said to be "at all times at the bottom of the opposition (if such existed) to the king of instruments in Scotland."

I am, &c.,

JAMES J. FINLAY.

[ The article in question was not intended to convey the impression that throughout Scotland organs, as aids to congregational worship, were entirely eschewed; it was rather desired to show that in certain quarters, despite modern enlightenment, extreme Puritanism yet flourished; that a considerable prejudice still existing against this instrument in that country as compared with the universal welcome extended to it in England. The writer is glad to learn from so good an authority as Mr. Lake that bigotry is rapidly waning, and the value of instrumental music is becoming more widely appreciated. It should be pointed out that, while there is but one Convocation to speak for England, Scotland has Assemblies and Assemblies. That which one of these gatherings may see fit to banish in another, is hailed with strong Calvinistic tendencies, as a condemnation savouring of the "de'il." The Musical Standard is not the paper in which to discuss the bewildering question of "Which is the True Church in Scotland"? No, Southern mind, even if trained on the admirable logical system of Dugald Stewart and Sir William Hamilton, can succeed in discovering to which body this appellation justly belongs, and which should rank as schismatic. The singular divided condition of the Church in North Britain, and the fierce contentions arising therefrom, are beyond both the comprehension and interest of average English people. There are the Free Kirk, the State Church, the United Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, and numerous sects of Dissenters. Ecclesiastical matters seem much mixed. The question which of these associations possess genuine cathedrals, and which those that can but be classed as soi-disant, is a burning one whereon strong differences of opinion obtain. Mr. Lake assumes that the Assembly alluded to in the article was not justified in speaking for the Churches generally; he is probably right. His remarks as to the "noisy objectors" and "spirit of intolerance" which organs in Scotland are still subjected to affords valuable testimony as to the temper existing there. It is a proof that the Puritanism comdemned on in the article, though happily dying out, is not extinct. His candid admission, that "money is often a stumbling-block," completely disposes of Mr. Finlay's assertion that "bawbee-worship" has nothing to do with the introduction of the instrument. It would be useless to dispute with Highlanders on the charm of a "skirl on the pibroch of Donald Dhu." The question is one of nationality, not of artistic merit, of inherited clannishness rather than of cultured taste.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

"IMPROVISATION."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—I have perused with much interest the article entitled "Improvisation," and Mr. Ferdinand Praeger's observations thereon. To my mind the aptitude requisite for a display of this description resembles in a marked degree the faculties essential to the impromptu speaker. He, too, after a preliminary observation or so—which may be likened to the prelude in music—sets off with some leading theme to which he must from time to time revert if he would impart to his oration the seeming blend of logical sequence and cohesion. But it is not merely by means of the skilful manipulation of words born of long habit and experience, nor by the repetition of well-worn phrases, however appropriate they may be to the occasion, that he can succeed in captivating his hearers. To win the applause of a discriminating audience, he must bring to his task a more uncommon talent. He must be gifted with identity; and in like manner it is necessary for the musical improviser, who would lay claim to the same distinction, that he should be endowed with the self-same faculty. It is also unquestionably true, though few may be aware of it, that just as the mechanical part of speech-making may be acquired by practice, so, too, the mere reproduction and elaboration of a given musical phrase can be completely mastered. In proof of this assertion I may instance a fact which Mr. Praeger's natural reticence debarred him from mentioning, viz., that by means of his method of tuition his pupils are enabled to arrive at a surprising degree of perfection in this branch of art.

Mr. Praeger's tribute to Mr. Silas's extraordinary power of extemporising is well merited; and having had the privilege of hearing both of these gentlemen many times, I may perhaps be allowed to express the opinion that whilst the latter excels in the fugal development of themes, the performances of the former are characterised by a loftiness of conception combined with poetical sensibility which are, as far as my experience goes, unique.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

P. L. MOSELY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In your issue of last Saturday I observed a letter from Mr. Ferdinand Praeger on the subject of "Improvisation" initiated by Mr. Birch, which I read with particular interest, as it has often been my good fortune to listen to Mr. Praeger's actual exposition of his own meaning therein explained.

It is a subject on which Mr. Praeger had a special right to be heard, as he himself possesses the gift in a remarkable degree.

It will be remembered that Shelley, in his "Ode to the Skylark," says:

"Bird thou never wert,
That from heaven, or near it, pourest thy full heart
In profuse strains of unpremeditated art."

This is ideal improvisation, and when controlled by the ready mind of a master well stored with the knowledge of his craft, improvisation of the highest order must ensue.

It is Mr. Praeger's possession of this rare faculty, and the justice of stating what is due to him—who with his habitual modesty has effaced himself and praised others—that impels me to write you on the subject.

On the platform Mr. Praeger has been singularly happy in his extemporary illustrations. Their appropriateness and spontaneity have surprised all, and the hope is earnestly expressed that he may be seen more in public.

Yours obediently,

Nov. 27th, 1883. HENRY J. EDWARDS.

Passing Events.

The rehearsals of Mr. Gilbert and Sir A. Sullivan's new opera are now commencing, it is said.

A taking, light, comic operetta has been produced in Madrid, entitled "Politica e tauromachia." The music is by the composers Rubio and Espino.

The Accrington Vocal Union recently gave its first concert of the season, performing Gaul's "Holy City" and Birch's "Robin Hood." Mr. Tattersall conducted with care and skill.

"A concert overture" by Mr. van Heddegham, was played at the Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden, for the first time on Nov. 23rd. The work is interesting, musicianly, and well scored.

Lectures on Bach and Mendelssohn, with copious musical illustrations, have been given recently by Messrs. G. Ashdown Audsley, and H. A. Branscombe, at the St. Margaret's Institute, Liverpool.

At a special Chapter held in Canterbury Cathedral on Nov. 27th, the appointment of precentor with minor canonry, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. R. Hake, was conferred upon the Rev. Frederick Helmore.

At Mr. Hallé's concert on Thursday, Nov. 22nd, at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, the programme included Brahms's Symphony in D, Mozart's Concerto in C (No. 16), and the overtures to "Leonora" (No. 2) and "La Gazza Ladra."

Isidore di Solda's new cantata, "Sisera" will be performed for the first time on Dec. 5th, at the Student's Concert of the Guildhall School of Music by a ladies' choir of seventy voices, under the conductorship of the principal, Mr. H. Weist Hill.

"Lieutenant Helene" is a new comic opera by Ernest Catenhusen, lately produced in New York. The music is said to be pretty, but wanting in character and dramatic power. The title is explained by the heroine appearing attired as a dashing young officer.

The Preston Choral Society announce that they will give their first concert of the season on Dec. 10th, when Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Elijah," will be rendered with a full band and chorus of 240 voices. Mr. Santley has been engaged for the occasion. Mr. James Tomlinson will preside at the organ and Signor Risegari will conduct.

At the first concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York, Bach's Toccata for Organ in F, was played as an orchestral work with striking effect; though pedal tone was found to be lacking. Mr. Mackenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" was also given. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 4. Mr. Theodore Thomas conducted as usual.

It is announced that Herr Carl Armbruster, the musical conductor, has undertaken to give, on the 17th Dec., at the London Institution, a lecture on "Richard Wagner and his Dramatic Works." The lecture will be musically illustrated by the lecturer himself, vocally assisted by Misses Friedländer and Damian, and Messrs. Ritter and Thorndike.

The extensive and valuable library of music of the late Stephen N. Barber, Esq., of Denmark Hill, including a large selection of organ music, oratorios, masses, etc., in score, instrumental works, a few curious old MSS. works of the History and Theory of Music, and a quantity of miscellaneous music were sold by auction, by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson at their gallery, on Tuesday Nov. 27th.

The "Birds" of Aristophanes, found a first hearing at Cambridge on the 27th. Mr. Hubert Parry, Mus.Doc., wrote the overture, entr'actes, and choral passages, scoring, it is reported, for strings and wood wind only; and Mr. Villiers Stanford, Mus.Doc., conducted. The music is spoken of as bright, melodious and graceful, and so admirably suited to the character of the play.

Says the Athenæum:—The various reports from Cologne relative to the production of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" agree as to the genuine and decisive success of the opera. It has already been accepted by Herr Pollini for performance in Hamburg. The new ballet music in the second act and the new finale to the fourth act are said to be great improvements.

A Welsh Eisteddfod, under the presidency of Sir Watkin Williams, will be held at the Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street, S.W., on Tuesday evening, Dec. 4th. There will be a choral competition at 7 by some half-dozen different choral bodies. The musical adjudicators are Mr. E. H. Turpin, assisted by Mr. H. A. Evans, and Mr. Thomas Davies. The accompanist will be Mr. E. J. West.

Mr. Fountain Meen set a notable example at his concert of Nov. 21st by confining his selection of music to the works of living English composers. The programme included two movements from Mr. Ebenezer Prout's Pianoforte Quartet in C, Op. 2, three movements from a Pianoforte Quartet by Mr. Henry R. Rose, and pianoforte solos by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, played by Mr. Fountain Meen himself.

Signor Agostmo Giuliano Susini, aged 60 years, an Italian by birth, and formerly an operatic singer, was crossing Westminster Road, near the bridge, on the 17th inst., when a hansom cab came up and knocked him down, the wheel passing over him. He was taken to St. Thomas's Hospital, where his injuries were attended to, and was subsequently conveyed home, but he gradually sank, and expired on the 24th.

Messrs. Ridley Prentice and Alfred Burnett's first chamber concert was given at the Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult. The programme included Beethoven's String Trio in C minor, Op. 9; Mendelssohn's Variations, Op. 17, for piano and violoncello; Schubert's Rondo in B minor, for piano and violin; and E. Prout's Piano Quartet in F, Op. 18, the last work being given for the first time in public.

In Spohr's memoirs is the following:—"At the rehearsals of my Oratorio my little girl of eight years attended. She remained quiet until the final number, which was a fugue; then her eyes grew bright and she listened with sustained attention. We concluded that she had a penchant for music of a severe character, and asking her about it, she replied: 'Oh! no, papa, but I know when that piece is finished, we go directly home for dinner!'"

The Highbury Philharmonic Society gave their first, and a successful concert on Nov. 26th, under the able direction of Dr. Bridge. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Athalie," and a miscellaneous selection. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Evelyn Gibson, and Miss Marian McKenzie, and the illustrative verses of "Athalie" were read by the Rev. Gordon Calthrop, M.A. The band and chorus of this flourishing society now number 200 performers.

Italian Opera is now all the rage in New York. "Lohengrin" (Italian version) "Faust" and "La Traviata" have been recently performed at the Metropolitan Opera House. "Linda di Chamounix," "Rigoletto," "La Gazza Ladra," "Martha," "Lucia," and "Il Trovatore," have been heard at the Academy of Music. The fashionable people in New York appear to support the performances enthusiastically, though the critics have much to find fault with at both houses.

In honour of St. Cecilia, Patroness of the Little Oratory, Brompton, some choice music was given on Sunday, Nov. 25th. The instrumentalists were: pianoforte, Mr. T. Wingham; oboe, Mr. Malsh; clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; horn, Mr. T. Mann; bassoon, Mr. Wotton. The vocalists were Master Albert Hannagan, Messrs. Russon, Pearson, and Tabb (of the Oratory choir); organ, Mr. Pitts. The music included, Quintet in E flat (Mozart), for piano, oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon; Quartet "Blest are the departed" (Spohr) for the wind instruments; and Quartet "Quando Corpus" ("Stabat Mater") (Rossini), sung by Master Hannagan, Messrs. Russon, Pearson, and Tabb.

The following statement is made: "Mr. F. H. Fowler has now delivered the seat plans and elevations of the new National Opera House which Mr. J. H. Mapleson hopes to build on the Victoria Embankment. According to these plans there will be 460 orchestral and 449 balcony stalls, 90 private boxes on three tiers, 500 amphitheatre stalls, and 860 amphitheatre seats. Bouquet and music counters are provided on the stall level, and on the first tier there will be a spacious foyer, the Royal apartments, a ladies' boudoir, and a smoking-room. The practical character of this announcement will not convince all the sceptical, who lacking faith in the scheme, seem to have accepted the homely proverb "seeing is believing" with regard to the National Opera House.

QUERIES.

"IONE."—I shall be glad if you, or some of your correspondents, could give me any information about an opera, called "Ione," or the Last Days of Pompeii (composer unknown), as to where the music be can be obtained, etc.—R. A. SUTTON.

ORGANISTS IN LONDON CHURCHES.—Would some of the readers of the Musical Standard kindly give a list of the present Organists in the London Churches; it would greatly interest provincials, and be a useful guide to them in visiting the metropolis?—HARMONIC FLUTE.

REPLY.

J. H. R. will find "L'Harmonium Concertant," by Wilboe, a most interesting and well-arranged collection of pieces, for pianoforte and harmonium. It is published by Litolff (Vol. 899), at 2s. 6d. nett. Hammond and Co. also publish a set of arrangements for ditto, entitled "Les Beautés Dramatiques."—F. N. BAXTER.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

"Grand Messe des Morts" (Op. 5) ..... Berlioz.
(Second performance in England).
The work is Choral throughout.

Requiem and Kyrie, Introit.	Lachrymosa.
Dies Iræ. Prose.	Domine Jesu Christ, Offertorium.
Tuba Mirum.	Hostias et Preces.
Quid sum Miser.	Sanctus (Tenor Solo and Chorus).
Rex Tremendæ.	Solo .. Mr. Harper Kearton.
Quærens Me (unaccomp. chorus).	Agnus Dei.

Conductor - - AUGUST MANNS.

For the second time in England, Berlioz's "Grande Messe des Morts" was performed on Saturday last. It was first brought out last spring at the Crystal Palace, and although the choral part was at that time indifferently done, the general impression produced, and the interest aroused in the work were so great, that another and more perfect performance became necessary. It was suggested at that time by a leading critic that Mr. Barnby's choir and orchestra at the Albert Hall should at once take it in hand, but this was a little ungracious, seeing that Mr. Manns had first of all had the courage and enterprise to make it known to the English people. Besides, things are now looking up at the Crystal Palace as regards choral singing; the orchestra, so indispensable in all Berlioz's works, always was, and still is, the most perfect in London.

It soon became evident on Saturday that the choir was well up to its work. Careful and untiring rehearsals, with the advantage of a professional semi-chorus—which added greatly to the effect in certain portions of the work, and afforded rest and relief to the general chorus, in enabling them to take up the points with vigour and accuracy—produced a highly satisfactory result. No number was transposed, as was given out by some who were sitting near me, and the tenor part, which is so trying, was admirably sung; in short the entire performance of both choir and orchestra, merits high commendation. Absolute perfection in so great and difficult a work could only be expected by the hypercritical. Mr. Harper Kearton again won golden opinions in the solo part of the "Sanctus," and Mr. Eyre presided most ably at the organ.

As I before gave a detailed description of the work, I need only now remark that after a second hearing, I am still more favourably impressed with it. Opinions of course vary respecting its value. Some contend that it is "a mere grand display," but when the subject demands it, Berlioz is not wanting in stern masculine simplicity and strength. So far as Sydenham is concerned, public opinion has already pronounced in its favour, and anon other places will doubtless join in the verdict there given. Controversy on the subject is useless. Per troppo dibatter la verita si perde.

Mr. Santley.

Quartet in G minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Holländer, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist .. .. .. Mr. ZERBINI.

There is an altogether unusual pleasure in being able to speak with genuine enthusiasm of a work by Brahms. It is unfortunately true that the earlier is the opus number attached to one of his compositions, the more chance there is of its proving enjoyable. His two sextets for strings afford proof of this, if proof be wanted. The later of these works (Op. 36 in G major), was presented by the same artists as are named in the above programme, with the exception of Herr Straus in place of Herr Holländer, last season, and was received in a manner little short of apathetic: the earlier, (Op. 18) was given, as will be seen, last Saturday, and was received with expressions of the keenest delight, the Scherzo being unanimously encored. This Sextet is one of Brahms's happiest inspirations, or it would perhaps be more correct to say, it is one of his inspirations, not one of his cold, laboured, disagreeable studies. Few works are more unpleasant to listen to than his Sextet, Op. 36; few more entirely delightful than his Sextet, Op. 18. The melodies are simple and lovely, the distribution of the parts generally judicious, though in the first movement the melody is occasionally hampered by unsatisfactory accompaniments, and in the air with variations the effects are not always entirely agreeable; but, judging the work broadly, it is conspicuous for the very merits that are rarely found in Brahms: grace, spontaneousness, simplicity, tenderness, and geniality. The scherzo is gracefulness itself, and seldom does one meet with a melody so sweetly simple as the subject of the final Rondo. The work was played by each performer with the most sympathetic appreciativeness, which resulted in an interpretation seldom equalled for delicacy and finish—seldom equalled even by these accomplished artists.

M. de Pachmann's rendering of the sonata left nothing to be desired: his poetical phrasing and exquisite touch are ever more and more appreciated. In response to the perhaps too-natural encore, he played one of Chopin's valses.

Mr. Santley's welcome always awaits him. After his undoubtedly favourite "Medjé," he sang the same composer's "Maid of Athens."

Mozart's Quartet was not in its place after so much modern music: it is cold and stiff even amid more old-fashioned surroundings, and does not appear to be of those works (of which Mozart has written many) which, because the youngest generation still loves them, "will never grow old"; for Bulwer Lytton's aphorism, "We are ever young while the young can love us," applies to the inner life of a work of art as well as of an individual human being.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

On the evening of Monday, Dec. 3rd., a new work by an English composer headed the programme.

PART I.

Quartet in A flat, for pianoforte and strings ..... Parry.
(First time).
Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Straus and Piatti.

Song, "Penitence" ("Bass-Lied") ..... Beethoven.

Prelude and Fugue in G minor, for pianoforte alone .... Bach.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann.

PART 2.

Quartet in B flat (Op. 76), No. 4, for two violins, viola and violoncello ..... Haydn.
Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.

Song, "Zuleika" ..... Mendelssohn.

Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello ..... Mozart.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist .. .. .. Mr. ZERBINI.

The production of Mr. Parry's new work naturally interested the subscribers, but the audience—rare occurrence at these concerts—was not so numerous as might have been expected. Mr. Hubert Parry, said to be the "proselyte" of a particular school, so far establishes his footing that he relies on learning and technical devices of art rather than inspiration, although the divine afflatus may not be wanting on occasions. The first allegro, bold and effective, sounds slightly common-place; the annotator of the programme notices the "utter disregard of form," and the "peripatetic" style of the construction, hardly on a par with the philosophy of the famous Stagyrite whose school gave meaning to the word. Contrapuntal writing is here introduced as a matter of course, and a canon on the octave, happily brief, dragged into service. This canon is the opening theme, here written in F major. This work is well laid out between the string instruments and the pianoforte. The Scherzo in F minor, quaint and lively, depends for its point on long skips, but there are several efflorescences, with a remarkable episode in C major, where the measure also is changed from 6-8 to 3-4 time. The andante in D flat, and triple measure, made a very favourable impression; but must be heard again for full appreciation. The finale, spirited, but again tending to banalité, adopts the now rather conventional and so far tiresome custom of re-introducing the chief theme of the first movement (already canonized): it here occurs in B flat. This quartet will not derogate from Mr. Parry's already recognized reputation. Uproarious applause broke forth at the end, from a section of the audience, but the unmeaning encore was very properly declined.

"Papa" Haydn's string quartet, one of about twelve in the same key, was admirably played, and fully appreciated. Mozart's delicious pianoforte trio, introduced at these concerts for the first time—(credat Judæus)—bears date A.D. 1783. All three movements might be stamped and labelled "Salzburg," so saturated are they with the master's own inimitable characteristics. Sir Henry Bishop may have formed the opening phrase of his hackneyed vocal trio, "Blow, gentle gales," from the theme of the Allegro in F major. How obviously and elegantly Mozartean is the creeping up to this phrase by chromatic intervals; the sharpening of the tonic and the supertonic; as in other instances, to be found in Mozart's scores passim. The andantino, a Minuet in G major, also suggests the first phrase of Bishop's glee. In the finale (6-8 time), so pert and vivacious, good memories might recall the air of, "Life let us cherish," a pleasing theme, borrowed by Woelfl in his impudently entitled sonata, "Ne plus ultra," gone beyond, and far beyond, by Dussek.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played in Mr. Parry's quartet and this last trio, plays Bach's piece without a book; the arrangement for pianoforte is by the Abbé Liszt. Accuracy and clearness distinguished the elegant reading. Thanks to the lucidity of the evolution, the theme of the Fugue was not once lost sight of, amidst all its intricate surroundings. Beethoven's "Buss-Lied," a very dolorous piece, suitable for penitential Lent, and perhaps to the "preparatory" season of Advent, won a recall for Miss Ambler, the vocalist of the evening.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann is to play again on Monday night (three pieces of Chopin.) He has enough on his hands for Dec. 10th, when the first recital of the gifted Polish pianist will be held in St. James's Hall at half-past 3 o'clock.

"FALKA" AT THE ROYAL COMEDY THEATRE.

This last production at the above theatre is an opera comique in three acts, after MM. Leterrier and Vanloo, the libretto by H. B. Farnie, and the music composed by F. Chassaigne. The scene is laid in Hungary, and the plot turns upon the finding of a nephew, Tancred, as collateral heir to a military governor named Folbach, who is himself childless. The nephew on his way to his uncle is, however, waylaid by robbers, but rescued by Edwige, (sister of the robber chief Boleslas), who falls in love with his voice, as she cannot see him through the intensity of the darkness. In the meanwhile, Falka, the niece of the governor, who has been sent to a convent, appears on the scene, having escaped with a young lover named Arthur. Tancred follows, but dares not reveal his identity from fear of the robber chief who has pursued him; and the niece, to escape being taken back by Pelican, the porter of the convent, assumes a hussar's dress and declares herself Tancred. Upon this change of characters the whole comic embroglio of the piece turns.

The music of this work is in many instances decidedly tuneful, and of the kind often described as "ear tickling," but it can scarcely lay claim to much originality, and is in this respect far behind its predecessor, "Rip Van Winkle." The most attractive numbers are the opening patrol chorus "While all the town is sleeping," the trio, "'Tis the Captain Boleslas," the air Tzigane, "Cradled upon the heather," with its chorus "To the greenwood" and Bohemian dance, and the Romance, "At eventide." Mr. Harry Paulton (Folbach), displayed his well-known quaint comicalities. Mr. Hamilton (Boleslas), has a good stage presence, and is the possessor of a fine bass voice, and if he would only adopt the closed timbre a little more often in some of his upper notes, his singing would be all that could be desired. He was especially successful in the air with refrain, "I am the Captain Boleslas"; and in the trio, "Cradled upon the Heather," the latter in my opinion the cleverest number in the opera. Miss Violet Cameron (Falka), played and sang in her accustomed manner, and her efforts in the song, "At Eventide," were duly appreciated. Miss Wadman (Edwige) in appearance, acting, and singing, was charming throughout. Mr. Kelleher (Arthur) rendered his part, as he always does, in a highly satisfactory manner. Mr. Penley (lay-brother Pelican), provoked considerable merriment. Mr. Ashley made the most of and was irresistibly funny in the somewhat silly part of Tancred. The choruses have evidently been very carefully trained, and the whole opera went very steadily under the able conductorship of M. Van Biene. The scenery and dresses are alike beautiful, and considering its amusing character, the piece should have a long run.

ARMAND SEMPLE.

THE "REDEMPTION" OF GOUNOD.

The performance of Gounod's grand oratorio attracted to the Albert Hall on the night of November 28th, the largest audience, perhaps, on record since the opening.

The "principal" vocalists were Mdme. Albani, Miss M. Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. R. Hilton, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Barnby waved the bâton, and Dr. Stainer made his organ "a thing of life and soul."

The performance of the band was almost perfect throughout, except that, more than once, in the early part of the oratorio, the flutes, though very prominent, failed in respect of precise intonation, and the horns were sometimes slightly flat. The "Prologue" was delivered with great effect, and the "typical" melody fully asserted its beauty. The Chorus struck attentive auditors as an unusually excellent corps; they certainly maintained the pitch, or, in other words, sang in tune. The entire scenery of the Crucifixion was solemn and thrilling; in parts, very pathetic. Salient points were Mary's solo, "While my watch I am keeping"; the "Darkness"; the "Earthquake," and the chorales. Once more to speak of Gounod's work as a composition, the First Part appears, after three or four hearings, to be superior to the other two, because more powerful and positive. The gem solo, "From Thy love as a Father," exquisitely rendered by Mme. Albani, won an encore, happily the only bis of the evening. Happily, it may be said, because the effect of a repetition in these sacred works seems equivalent to the second reading of a Prayer or Collect in the Liturgy. The audience further displayed their good taste and forbearance, so unusual in England, by refraining from applause, so as not to interrupt the performance. Mr. Santley sang very impressively, and the other solos were all well rendered. The scene of "The Holy Women at the Sepulchre," again sounded rather trivial; indeed, some of the music unavoidably recalls the composer of "Faust" in certain hints of the Garden Scene and Mephistopheles.

Much as "The Redemption" may be admired by pious persons and lovers of the eccentric style of writing, the fact remains obstinately and stubbornly fixed—that many musicians, connoisseurs of theoretical and practical authority, decline to accept this oratorio as a sterling specimen of its kind. Some details of their criticism have been given on previous occasions. The work never ascends to the celestial dignity of Milton's "high argument." It is admitted by ardent admirers, that the vis dramatica gradually declines, so as to produce the uncanonical effect of anti-climax. Few of the themes, "leading" or "subordinate," sound as if animated by the afflatus Minervæ. Above all, the vague, restless, and erratic character of the incessant tonal changes seem to denote a limitation of spontaneous thought to be covered and concealed by a meteoric shower of sharps and flats.

Mr. Barnby has been loudly called upon to perform "La Messe des Morts," of Hector Berlioz. Let him accept the flattering invitation by all means, next Lent or before.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The annual Advent Service was held on Dec. 4th, the chief musical portion of which was derived from Spohr's "Last Judgment" ("Die Letzten Dinge.") If occasionally the musical treatment is somewhat secular in tone, this is felt as less antagonistic amid the surroundings of our metropolitan cathedral than would be the case in an ancient Gothic temple, where a severer style is perhaps more appropriate. The performance was given without orchestral accompaniments, the want of which detracts somewhat from the effect of music in which the instrumentation is so essential a feature, Spohr having been one of the greatest masters of orchestral colouring. The want was supplied by the Cathedral organ, the extensive resources of which were most skilfully and artistically used by Dr. Stainer. The choruses were excellently sung by the Cathedral choir, with bright, fresh quality of tone, true intonation, and excellent execution. Several movements produced a great effect, especially the opening chorus, "Praise His awful name," the Sanctus, "All glory to the Lamb," "Blessing, honour, glory, and power," and the final jubilant, "Great and wonderful"—the quartet and chorus, "Blest are the departed" having been particularly impressive. Among the pieces for solo voices the duet, "Forsake me not" was, as usual, a special feature. This was very well sung by Master Burry and and Mr. A. Kenningham, as were other portions of the music by these vocalists, and Masters Richardson and Birch, Mr. Hansom, and Mr. Kempton.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A Students' Concert was held on Wednesday evening (5th inst.) at the City of London School, Victoria Embankment, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Weist Hill. The proceedings commenced with the Cantique "Nazareth," Gounod, sung by Mr. A. S. Tucker and the ladies' choir; and this was followed by "Sisera," a cantata for treble voices, in which the solos were taken by Miss Edith Umpleby, Miss Florentia Bernani, Miss Clara Field, Miss H. Newman, Miss Clara Wolleston, and Miss Crux, and it was well received, the singing of Miss Umpleby being especially applauded. Miss Elizabeth Arthur, a pupil of Signor Li Calsi, gave a pianoforte solo, Prelude and Etude, (Golinelli), in a very creditable manner. The next number on the programme was, Trio in G major, Adagio, Rondo Hongroise, (Haydn); pianoforte, Miss Rosalie Kaufmann, pupil of Mr. O'Leary; violin, Miss Adela Duckham, Corporation Exhibitioner and pupil of Mr. G. Palmer; violoncello, Miss Lilian Watson; and the large audience were much astonished when these students came on the platform to find they were small children. The way in which each of them performed their parts was wonderful, and they were twice recalled, encores not being permitted at these concerts. The youngest of the three was the violinist, Miss Adela Duckham, who is nearly nine years of age; she was last year awarded a Corporation Exhibition of six guineas per annum, at the Guildhall School, where she is studying both the violin and pianoforte, the last-mentioned being under Mr. Lindsay Sloper. Last April she won a first prize for pianoforte solo playing, and a first-class certificate for pianoforte sight-playing at the Stratford Musical Festival. A selection was given from John Barnett's opera, "The Mountain Sylph," in which Miss May Hallam, Miss Newman, Miss Nelly McEwen, and Messrs. Richardson, Henderson, Pierpoint, Jones and Lister, took part, and their efforts were much appreciated, and there were several recalls. A very successful concert was brought to a close by the glee, "Mynheer van Dunck," by the members of the sight-singing class. Mr. J. Henry Leipold was the accompanist.

THE LOMBARD AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

This society gave their first smoking concert for the season 1883-4, in the large hall of the Cannon Street Hotel, on Wednesday evening, Nov. 28th, conducted by Mr. Arthur H. D. Prendergast. The society (established in 1872) consists of twenty-five singing members (altos, tenors, and basses), and of some 250 subscribers for admission to the smoking concerts, of which four are usually given during the season. The programmes consist chiefly of unaccompanied madrigals and part-songs, interspersed with a few vocal and intrumental solos. The following was the programme for last week's concert:—

Madrigal, "Come, let us join"	Beale.
Glee, "The Angler's Glee"	Netherclift.
Violin solo, "Two Spanish Dances"	Sarasate.
Violin, Mr. H. C. Esthoven.
Part-song, "Tell me where is fancy bred"	Pinsuti.
" " "The Arrow and the Song"	Macfarren.
Gloria in excelsis, "Messe des Orpheonistes," in C minor	Gounod.
Song, "The wreck of the Hesperus"	Hatton.
Mr. Frank Connery.
Violin Solo, "Réverie"	Vieuxtemps.
Mr. H. Enthoven.
Part-song, "Shall e'er my heart"	Winter.
" " "Go speed thy flight"	Otto.
" " "Daybreak"	Cusins.
" " "A garden is my lady's face"	Prendergast.
Pianoforte solo, "Two Polish dances"	Scharwenka.
Mr. F. Peachey, junr., honorary pianist to the Society.
Song, "The Bugler"	Pinsuti.
Mr. T. H. Lloyd.
Part-song, "The long day closes"	Sullivan.
Ballad Madrigal, "Shoot, false love"	Pearsall.

The remaining three smoking concerts will be on January 16th, March 13th, and May 1st, followed by a "Ladies' Night" fixed for May 7th.

PEOPLE'S ENTERTAINMENT SOCIETY.

On Saturday evening, December 1st, to an audience of nearly 2,000 people, the above Society gave another of their series of free concerts, at the new Town Hall, Bermondsey. The programme, which was an attractive one, consisted of a sacred and secular part. The Concert started with a good rendering, by the Bermondsey Band of the Metropolitan Choral Union, of Handel's "For unto us." The Choir also gave the "Hallelujah Chorus," which concluded the first part. A certain steadiness, which was somewhat lacking in "For unto us," was fully maintained in the "Hallelujah Chorus." Mr. James Budd gained an encore for his rendering of "Thou'rt passing hence" (Sullivan). Miss Mordaunt sang "O rest in the Lord," which neither suited her nor the audience. Mr. Henry Yates gave a fair rendering of "Come ye Children,"—"Recit and aria," from Sullivan's "Prodigal Son." Viscountess Folkestone followed on with a careful and artistic interpretation of Gounod's beautiful sacred song "There is a green hill far away"; and for a well earned encore, gave "The Children's Home."

The second part opened with a good rendering by the choir of Edwards's Madrigal "In going to my lonely bed." I was pleased to hear this vociferously cheered. The choir also gave a part-song, entitled "The Pilgrims," by Henry Leslie, which was also re-demanded. The readings of Mr. E. Stidolph were not impressive. I pass on to something more worthy of notice and praise,—the violin playing of Mr. J. J. White. Seldom have I heard a better violinist, a man at once original in style and execution, whose abilities are not merely technical, but purely artistic. His first solo was from his own pen, entitled, "Delires de Sappho." I cannot, however, speak so highly of his composition; it was, in parts, clever, but never pleasing. He met with a hearty reception, which was well deserved. Mr. James Budd, with his two "Royalty" songs, pleased all present. Miss Mordaunt was more successful in her secular effort. While an admirable rendering of a song by Viscountess Folkstone, entitled "Last Night we sailed," was fully appreciated. Mr. Edward Morton was an efficient accompanist,—and Mr. W. H. Leslie must be congratulated for his careful conducting. I must in conclusion remark, that I sincerely trust, such an admirable scheme as this will flourish as it deserves, and meet with whatever assistance it may at any time be in need of.

Geo. F. Grover.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY AT THE ALBERT HALL

On the evening of Friday, Nov. 30 (St. Andrew's Day), Mr. William Carter held a "grand Scotch Festival" at the Royal Albert Hall. The choir sang several part-songs in good time and with much spirit; one of these, Mr. Carter's own arrangement of "The Blue Bells of Scotland," evoked loudest applause. The "principal" artists were Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Foli, and Miss Patti Winter; many of them won encores for popular Scottish ditties. Mrs. Antoinette Sterling introduced a new song, the composition of Mr. W. Carter, entitled "The Child's Way to Heaven," inspired by words of the orthodox "goody" type, quite on a level, for inanity and silliness, with the ordinary run of juvenile magazines and Sunday-school books. An encore was declined by the vocalist. Mr. Foli sang another piece of Mr. W. Carter's (composed for him), "Brave and Fair," the old story of a "red rose on a woman's breast," well rendered and much applauded. The band of the Scots Guards played Scottish tunes. Mr. W. Carter and Mr. Bending played their stock duet for pianoforte and organ, the adagio in D minor from the "Scottish" symphony of Mendelssohn. Mr. J. B. Poznanski, as before, greatly pleased the people with his Scottish violin solos, clever adaptations of popular themes, and really very lucid developments of the genius of the instrument. Mr. W. Carter projects another Scottish concert on the "Burns Anniversary," Friday, Jan. 25, 1884.

EALING CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The first concert of the season was given on Monday last in the Lyric Hall before a crowded audience, and many well-known musicians. The programme included the "Requiem for Mignon" (Schumann), the "Ruy Blas" overture, the Scena "Infelice," and Rondo in E flat for piano and orchestra of Mendelssohn, and Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata, "On Shore and Sea." These, together with the Scherzo in B flat minor of Chopin, and two choruses, "Daybreak," and the "Rose and Lily Bell," by Mr. Eaton Faning and Mr. Ernest Ford respectively (the latter being redemanded), complete the list. The band was composed mainly of well-established favourites, among whom were Mr. F. Ralph (leader), Messrs. Szczepanowski, G. Horton, C. Harper, and Woolhouse, whilst the chorus consisted of about 100 voices. The soloists were Miss Thudichum, Mr. Fulkerson, and Mr. H. R. Russell, with Mr. T. A. Matthay as pianist. Concerning the performance, it may be said to have been a complete success, and to have quite justified the attempt of the committee to raise the association to a pitch of more than local importance. Miss Thudichum was in splendid voice, and sang the Scena superbly, the band playing with admirable precision and delicacy. Mr. Matthay won an encore for his rendering of the Chopin Scherzo, and then gave two of the same master's studies in a manner such as to call forth prolonged applause from the audience. Mr. Fulkerson and Mr. Russell performed the parts allotted to them satisfactorily. Mr. Ernest Ford conducted.

WARE.

An excellent concert of vocal and instrumental music was given by the Ware Musical Society on Tuesday evening in the Town Hall. There was a good attendance, and the audience thoroughly enjoyed the performances, which were altogether of a high order of merit. Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., was conductor. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Norman, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, and the Rev. S. W. P. Webb. The instrumentalists were Mr. J. E. Hilton (Nottingham), 1st violin; Mr. G. Hannell (Derby), 2nd violin; Mr. R. Read (Derby), viola; Mr. J. A. Adcock (Leicester), violoncello; Mr. Livesey Carrott, pianoforte; and Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. B. Oxon., harmonium. The programme was divided into two parts, the first being devoted to "Spring," Part 1 of Haydn's oratorio, "The Seasons;" and the second to Macfarren's cantata, "May Day," selections from Donizetti, Gounod, Rubinstein, Pinsuti, and other composers coming between.

CHELTENHAM.

The certificates gained for musical knowledge in connection with the Trinity College examinations were distributed at the Assembly Rooms on Tuesday evening, Nov. 27th. The chair was occupied by the Rev. E. Cornford, and he was supported by Mr. J. A. Matthews, the local secretary of the College, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus.Bac., who attended as Registrar of Trinity College. There was a good attendance. Mr. Matthews announced letters of apology from the Mayor, the Baron de Ferrieres, M.P., the Revs. A. Scott and R. Chamney, &c. The Warden of Trinity College (the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt) wrote regretting his inability to be present. He paid a warm compliment to Mr. Matthews, who for several years had worked so well and so patiently in the cause of musical education in the town, and congratulated him on the result numerically and educationally, of the Cheltenham examinations, which were as usual "highly satisfactory, and compared most favourably with those of other centres of similar size and importance in the United Kingdom." The Warden further showed the value of the Trinity College examinations, remarking that they tested the capabilities of those who were really worth the honour of so great a distinction as that of sound and successful tuition. Mr. Matthews gave a short sketch of the present position of the examinations in this town. They had made very satisfactory progress at the examination held this week. There were 118 entries this year, an excess of nine over last year. Since the examinations were commenced in the year 1876, no less than 700 had entered at this centre, the majority of whom had passed, for the most part, with honours; 75 entered this year for the examination in theoretical music, of whom 55 passed, and 34 obtained honours. Mr. Stark, in distributing the certificates, remarked that over 5,000 local candidates were examined by Trinity College, London, during last year.

BERKHAMPSTED.

The fifth annual concert of the Philharmonic Society was given at King Edward Sixth's Grammar School on Nov. 28th, before a crowded audience. Bennett's "May Queen," and a miscellaneous selection, were capitally given. Mr. J. Turpin, Mus.Bac., conducted. The Rev. C. J. Langley played a sonata by Tartini for violin in an admirable and artistic style, which elicited much admiration. Miss Ward Field, an excellent young soprano, gave great satisfaction. The entire performance formed an enjoyable evening's entertainment. Mr. J. Turpin and Rev. C. J. Langley played the accompaniments on the pianoforte and harmonium.

WEYMOUTH.

The Weymouth Oratorio Society gave their first concert of the season at the Royal Hotel Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening, Nov. 29th. Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was performed with much success. The solo vocalists were Madame Eva Scorey, of Southampton, from the Brussels Conservatoire, Mr. John Hayden, principal tenor of Salisbury Cathedral, and Mr. Hopkins, R.A.M., from Bridport, bass, all of whom were highly successful and much appreciated by the audience. The second part was miscellaneous, the principal items of which were two choruses by the Society, "The Heavens are telling" (Creation), and "Coronation Anthem" (Handel); solo, Mr. Hayden, "Be thou faithful unto death" (St. Paul); violoncello obbligato, Mr. W. Alcock, of Weymouth; solo, "Let the bright Seraphim" (Samson), Madame Eva Scorey; trumpet obbligato, Mr. Watts, of Weymouth; trio (piano, violin, and violoncello); Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo, and Finale (Reissiger) by Messrs. G. Thorne, conductor of the Society, Mr. W. Stone, leader of the local orchestra, and Mr. W. Alcock, of Weymouth. The conductor and leader might well be congratulated on the success of the concert, and their choice of soloists. Madame Scorey, in her solos, held her audience spell-bound, and received great applause.

UPTON CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Monday, the 3rd inst., the Upton Choral Society gave its third concert in the Town Hall, Stratford, the audience filling every part of the hall a long time before the performance was due to commence. Spohr's cantata, "God, Thou art great," formed the chief part of the programme, the principal vocalists being Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss F. Jones, and Mr. Arthur Thompson, all of whom sang with distinguished success; the duet, "Children, pray this love to cherish," was most effectively rendered. The choruses also were good throughout, Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, "Judge me, O God," being, perhaps, the best of the evening. The entertainment included some songs and part songs, besides a selection of instrumental music. Of the former, "The sands o' Dee" was exquisitely rendered by Mr. Arthur Thompson, while the honours of the instrumental part of the performance were heartily given to Herr Emil Mahr for his skilful execution of some beautiful and difficult music on the violin. Messrs. Kitson and Gilbert accompanied with pianoforte and harmonium respectively, with recognized ability, and Mr. Joseph Proudman conducted with his usual care and good judgment.

YARMOUTH.

The first concert of the present season, of the Yarmouth Musical Society, took place at the Aquarium on November 29th, and was in every respect successful. The Hall of this handsome building is admirably adapted for musical entertainments, while there is ample accommodation both for performers and the public. There was a large attendance. The general performance was praiseworthy. The execution of the choruses was good; indeed certain numbers, such as "Yet doth the Lord see it not," with its pendant chorale "For He, the Lord our God," and the most glorious of all songs of gratitude, "Thanks be to God," were given with great power and majesty. To relate all the successes of the choir, however, would be to catalogue all the choruses in the work. The playing of the small, but select, band throughout was admirable. The principal singers were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Fassett; Messrs. Redfern Hollins and Bridson.

Taken altogether the concert was one of the best that has been given by the Society, and credit is due not only to the leader, Mr. Cooke; Mr. Lane, who skilfully presided at the harmonium; and the band and choir, but to the indefatigable conductor, Mr. Stonex, under whose experienced guidance the inhabitants of this town were provided with a performance which has been seldom equalled here, and certainly not excelled.

NORTHAMPTON.

The first concert of the season of the local Choral Society took place on Nov. 27th. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and his equally exquisite "Hear my prayer," and also of popular songs and ballads. The "Hymn of Praise" constituted the first part of the concert, and was excellently rendered, professional artists, band, and chorus, all triumphing over every exigency, and evidencing thorough appreciation of the music performed. The professional vocalists were Miss Marian Fenna (soprano), Miss Jeanie Rosse (contralto), and Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor). The band, though weak in some departments, worked well and effectively. The choruses were throughout well rendered. The second part included certain popular songs, etc. Mr. J. H. Twinn, in the violin solos, "Cavatina" (Raff), "Gavotte" (Stephanie Ozibulka), played with a delicacy, phrasing power, and crispness of touch that delighted the audience, and called forth the praise of cultured music-lovers. Mr. Brook Sampson discharged the double duty of conductor and accompanist in a style thoroughly worthy of his reputation. Mr. A. W. Warren was leader of the band, and Mr. R. W. Strickland organist.

LIVERPOOL.

The fifth concert of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society takes place this evening, the principal attraction, vocally, being Mr. Bridson. The Andante and Scherzo from Hummel's septet in D minor is to be performed, and the so-called "grand symphony" is to be Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

The overtures will be Cherubini's "Lodoiska," Bennett's "The Naiades," and Gounod's "Mirella." A noteworthy fact in connection with this society is the advertisement offering gallery stalls for sale, a thing which has, I believe, never been done before. This is significant!

J. J. M.

WORCESTER.

Mr. Spark's second concert was given on Nov. 27th at the Public Hall, to a large audience. The soloists were Miss Annie Marriott, Mdme. Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson, names sufficiently well known in the musical world to justify every agreeable expectation, and the interest was increased by the announcement of the part to be taken by the Worcester Amateur Vocal Union, for the first time in connection with these concerts. The vocal solos included sundry of the favourite songs, etc. These, with a trio and quartet, and Mr. Cliffe's pianoforte solos, which were well appreciated, one being encored, made up the programme, apart from the performances of the Worcester Amateur Vocal Union. It has at different times been suggested to Mr. Spark that the members of the Union might, without sacrifice of modesty, take part in one of his concerts, which are attended by many persons who have not had other opportunities of hearing them. The Union has now had an existence of a little more than ten years, having been established in March, 1873, and of the twelve members who sang on this occasion just a moiety joined it at that date. They performed three selections —the part-song, "Vineta" (Abt), which was given with praiseworthy delicacy of expression; "The Wanderers' Song," by the same composer, which was sung with excellent crispness, and was loudly encored; and the serenade, "The Image of the Rose" (Reichardt), in which Mr. C. Fleet sang the solo with marked taste. The members of the Union are to be congratulated, with Mr. Spark, on their exhibition of the results of careful practice and experienced conductorship. It should be added that Mr. Stanley James played on one of the Ithica American organs, for which Mr. Spark is agent.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The Dublin Musical Society's opening performance for the present season took place on the 26th of November, in the large concert hall of the Royal University Buildings, the accommodating capacities of which were tested far beyond their resources, as the hall in some parts was uncomfortably crowded. Support has ever been held out to this society, and truly, it well deserves it. It has been labouring unremittingly for a number of years past in bringing before the public a large number of the works of the masters, and can therefore lay claim to having done much towards educating and developing the taste for classical music. The work selected for this concert was Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; and amongst the artists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mrs. Scott Fennel, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Santley. The society is indeed to be congratulated on the manner in which the work was got through, and the conductor, Mr. Joseph Robinson, to be complimented on the high degree of perfection which marked the choral parts; nor must I omit to mention the completeness of the orchestra, and the very effective manner in which they performed their work. Mrs. Hutchinson rendered her music with great taste and judgment; but it must be remarked that, at times, her singing had all the appearance of over-strain. Mrs. Scott Fennel acquitted herself in her usual graceful and artistic manner. To say that Mr. Santley gave a successful rendering of the music of the prophet is what everyone expects. Mr. Santley is well known to a Dublin audience; and those who had the pleasure of hearing him on the 26th of November may well say they enjoyed a treat. His vocalisation was simply perfect, full of feeling and sympathy. Mr. Henry Guy sustained the tenor part very creditably, and has created a very favourable impression in Dublin.

The second performance of the Dublin Chamber Music Union, for this its ninth season, took place on the 28th of November. The programme was as follows:—

Third Trio, in G minor (Op. 110) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello	Schumann.
Con moto ma non troppo—Un poco Adagio—Presto—Finale—Allegro giocoso.
Pavane, and Gavotte and Musette, from "Suite de Pieces," for pianoforte and violin (Op. 210)	Raff.
Ballade, No. 1 in G minor (Op. 23), for pianoforte alone	Chopin.
Largo and Rondo Giocoso (violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment)	Boccherini.
Trio in E minor (Op. 119), for pianoforte, violin and violoncello	Spohr.
Moderato—Larghetto—Scherzo—Finale vivace.

Too high praise cannot be accorded to the gifted artists Mons. Billet, piano, Herr Lauer, violin, and Herr Elsner, 'cello, who preside at these concerts. Where all is excellence, or so near approach thereto, it is a delicate task to make invidious distinctions; and I will therefore content myself on this occasion by saying that the performance throughout was of the highest order of merit, and afforded very great pleasure to a large, attentive, and most appreciative audience. For myself, I must say, that I do not remember any concert of the Society which afforded me such unqualified enjoyment as that under notice.

CORK.

A reaction, after the dulness consequent on the closing of the Exhibition has begun to set in, and the various musical societies are busy preparing for the coming season.

There have been several amateur concerts held in various places, but they call for no special comment. The programmes consisted of miscellaneous items, principally ballads.

Amongst the works to be produced here shortly by the Cork Musical Society, I see with pleasure, that Gounod's "Redemption," and Gaul's "Holy City" are down, the former being in rehearsal at present.

Miss Santley's Comic Opera Company are at the Theatre this week, with Audran's "La Mascotte," and Clay's "Merry Duchess." I went to hear the former on Tuesday, and cannot say I was greatly edified; the author (query, adapter) seeming to think that Comic Opera and Burlesque mean pretty much the same thing. The soloists were fairly good; the chorus, however, was not so good, though I have heard many a worse, trying to make in quantity what they lacked in quality. Several times also during the evening the orchestra and chorus seemed to be at loggerheads; and in one of his choruses Mr. Bolini (Pipps) had to stop, as the orchestra were playing faster than he could possibly sing. I may especially mention Miss Crofton (Bettina) and Mr. J. Pierpoint (Prince Fritellini); the latter, although having only one song, sang it in such a manner as to obtain an encore.

F. St. John Lacy.

Enfield.—A large and fine hall has just been opened. During the winter, concerts and entertainments will be given at the new "Athenæum." The concerts will be under the direction and management of Mr. Harold E. Stidolph, of Ealing, who has had much experience in giving high-class concerts. The increase of public halls, and the spread of good concerts, will do much to bring down the selfish, foolishly perpetuated concert monopolies, which do much harm to art in London in the way of restricting the number of accepted performers, and by practically ignoring the claims of young artists of merit.

BATH.

Recently a vocal and instrumental concert for the benefit of a Bath citizen, Mr. J. C. Mather, was given at the Assembly Rooms. During his brief career in English opera Mr. Mather attained very gratifying successes, and the numerous friends who rallied round him, both as audience and performers, testified by their presence to his well-merited popularity. Mr. Mather was in excellent voice, and sang with a dramatic intensity that drew from the audience the warmest plaudits. His success was pronounced in the "Toreador song," from "Carmen," and in Gatty's fine song, "True till death." The latter seemed specially suited to display the wide range and power of his voice, and was enthusiastically encored. Verdi's quartet, "Un di se ben" (Rigoletto), Sir Michael Costa's "Ecco quel fiero" (quartet), and "This magic wove scarf" (Barnett), were very acceptable items of the programme, the vocalists being successively Miss Edwards, Miss Ada Curtis, Miss F. Edwards, Mr. Atwell, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Mather. Mr. H. T. Sims, who combined the duties of accompanist and conductor, played Beethoven's "Andante in F," and Mr. Broom, in a flute solo, "American fantasia," displayed the art of difficult manipulation with effect. An efficient band contributed an overture and a march. Mr. Mather and his friends may be congratulated on having produced an entertainment so thoroughly enjoyed by a crowded house, though the evening was unduly prolonged by the frequency of the encores.

NEWBURY.

The Newbury Amateur Orchestral Union gave two concerts, in aid of the Marsh Improvement Fund, on Nov. 27th. The soloists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Mdme. Mudie Bolingbroke, and solo violin Mr. T. E. Gatehouse. There was a very well balanced orchestra of 35 performers, the conductor being Mr. W. D. Eatwell. The accompanist was Mr. A. Walton, Mus.Bac. F.C.O. The afternoon concert was thinly attended. The programme included Reverie (Schumann), Symphony Movement by Haydn, and De Beriot's 1st Violin Concerto, played well by Mr. Gatehouse. The evening performance was largely attended, the hall being quite full. The programme included: Auber's lively "Fra Diavolo" overture, a noisy repetition of De Beriot's Concerto; fantasia, "The Forge in the Forest" (Michaelis), with an absurd anvil part, too barbarous surely for a concert room. This piece was given at both performances. The several dance tunes and marches were felt to be errors of selection, and the society will do well to select higher class for study and performance. The solo singers pleased greatly in their English songs. As a whole the performances were good, and thoroughly creditable to the society.

Leamington.—Mr. F. Spinney's second chamber concert, recently given, was in every way a success. A large audience testified to their admiration of the brilliant pianoforte solos by Madame Mary Meyer, an artist of whom Leamington may indeed be proud. The Valse Brilliante, and that in minuet time being greatly appreciated, and receiving the only recall during the performance. Our readers will doubtless remember Madame Meyer formerly playing in public as Miss Mary Mander. She is the daughter of a respected townsman, Mr. H. Mander, of the Parade. Since that time she has been studying in Germany with excellent results. The vocalist was Miss Minnie Gwynne, a distinguished pupil of Mr. Alberti Visetti. This lady gave the beautiful song, "Piano, piano cantopio," from Der Freischutz, with great effect; and two charming songs, "Si tu, Mainais," and "Embarrassment," in a most finished style. It is unnecessary to do more than allude to the "strings." Where all was good it seems invidious to particularise, but Mr. J. Ward's admirably performed violin solo should not pass unnoticed. Mr Spinney certainly deserves general support for these delightful concerts.

Mirfield.—The Battyeford Amateur Musical Society, assisted by the Manningham Vocal Union, gave the opening concert of their session on Nov. 29th, in the Town Hall, Mirfield, before a large and fashionable audience. The works selected were "The Building of the Ship," for the first part; and Mendelssohn's Psalm, "Hear my Prayer," with a miscellaneous second part. This was the first time that Barnett's cantata, "The Building of the Ship," has been performed in this neighbourhood since it was brought out, three years ago, at the Leeds Musical Festival. Many listeners were quite unprepared for such an excellent rendering of this difficult work; and those who are acquainted with the cantata will know what credit is due to the chorus, for the way in which some of the more exacting passages were sung. The solos were taken by Miss Norton, Mrs. Clarke, Messrs. Peacock and Riley. A well-selected band, led by Mr. Dawson, supported, in a satisfactory manner, the efforts of the chorus. Besides the very effective rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," in the second part, Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," was beautifully sung by Miss Norton; while Gounod's "Nazareth," was given with great success by Mr. Riley. This is the second concert which has been given under the training of Mr. J. H. Rooks, of Bradford, and the society must be congratulated upon having for their conductor a man of such energy and ability.

SALISBURY.—The Members of the Salisbury Vocal Union gave an excellent concert, on the 28th of November, to one of the largest audiences ever seen in the Hamilton Hall, many persons being unable to obtain admission. The first part of the programme was devoted to Dr. Stainer's Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus." The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, Mr. J. A. Acott, and Mr. Arthur Crick. The Cantata was exceedingly well rendered, and gave great satisfaction. In the second part a miscellaneous selection was given. The soloists were Miss Julia Jones. Messrs. Marr, Hayden, Crick and Kelsey, of the Cathedral choir, all of whom received encores for their songs. Miss Harwood and Mr. Alfred Foley very ably presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively. Mr. John M. Hayden as usual conducted.

PRESTON.—On Saturday evening, December 1st, the first of a series of Cheap Concerts for the People, given by Mr. Sam. Lee, took place in the New Public Hall. The band of the Preston Rifles occupied the orchestra, and during the evening rendered in a pleasing manner, selection "Patience" (Sullivan); Cavatina La Rossignol (Reynolds); Chorus, "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn); selection, "Il Guiramento" (Mercadante); Fantasia "Field of the Cloth of Gold" (Victor Bout); and chorus, "Hallelujah" (Handel). Miss Marsh sang sweetly "Going to Market,"—"No Sir,"—"Killarney,"—"The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington." Mr. McMahon sang "The Death of Nelson,"—"The Pilgrim of Love,"—"Love's Request." Mr. J. Thompson sang "The Little Hero,"—"The Flying Dutchman." The concert was a great success, the building being well filled. The prices of admission were the same as those charged at the organ recitals, viz., 6d. and 3d. Mr. T. Hogg rendered the accompaniments in a tasteful manner.

MAIDENHEAD.—On Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., the Philharmonic Society gave their first concert of the season in the Town Hall, to a large audience. The first part of the programme was devoted to a selection from Sir Arthur Sullivan's oratorio, "The Light of the World." The principal artists were Miss Fenna, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Of their singing it would be difficult to speak in too high terms; their rendering of the exquisite quartet, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death," was perfect, and not soon to be forgotten. The chorus singing was very good, the final fugue, "Now is come salvation and strength," being exceedingly well sung. A miscellaneous selection of songs, etc., formed the second part of the programme. Mr. W. A. Wrigley, Mus.Bac., Oxon., presided at the harmonium, and Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus.Bac., at the pianoforte. Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" is announced for the second concert.

ENNISKILLEN, IRELAND.—Mr. Arnold's benefit concert was given in the Town Hall, before a crowded house, on Wednesday, the 28th November. The church choir, augmented for the occasion, sang with considerable effect the following glees:—"Dawn of day" (S. Reay), "The Chough and Crow" (Bishop), the "Carnovale" (Rossini), "Glory and love to the men of old" (Gounod); the two latter were accompanied by the band of the 13th Somersetshire Light Infantry. Solos and duets were performed respectively by Miss C. McTiernan (violin), Miss M. Cooney (piano), and the Misses McTiernan, McKeague, Weaver, Benson, E. Graham; Messrs. Mercer and Veevers. The selections by band included overture, "Giovanna di Arco" (Verdi), "Polacco di Concert" (La Thière), Mrs. Valentine presided at the piano; Bandmaster Veevers conducted. A purse of gold has also been recently presented to Mr. Arnold, whose services as organist and choirmaster are thus practically appreciated.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

M. Alex. Guilmant gave the recital on Saturday last at the Bow and Bromley Institute to a crowded audience, who gave the accomplished organist a very cordial welcome. His first solo was "Fantasia and Fugue in F" (Emile Bernard), an interesting work, received with loud applause. M. Guilmant's second sonata in D major finely played, was also loudly applauded. A "Prayer in G flat" (E. Lemaigre) and Lemmens's "Pastorale in F," came next. This graceful movement was charmingly played, encored and repeated. An improvisation on Weber's "Last Waltz," really a composition of Reissiger's it is authoritively stated, was worked out with sound musicianship, and much applauded. The player's own "Bridal Chorus" was the final solo. Miss Eleanor Rees, a talented and promising young vocalist, and worthy student of the R.A.M., sang in a highly creditable style. She was encored in F. Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," substituting another song. To-night the soloists are Mr. H. Rose and Miss Clara Samuell. On Dec. 10th (not 20th, as announced by mistake), Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given. Mr. J. F. Bridge, Mus.Doc., has a highly interesting programme on Dec. 15th, including two of Handel's concertos with accompaniment of strings.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY.

Sir Herbert Oakeley gave last week his first recital this session to a crowded audience. There was a large attendance of students, by whom the Professor was warmly welcomed. These recitals are not confined to the Professor's own class, but are open to all matriculated students; and must prove an invaluable means of musical culture to those who avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing selections from the great masters played on the finest organ in Scotland. The fortnightly organ recitals will this session generally alternate with fortnightly lectures on Thursdays, which are also to be open to matriculated students—another instance of Sir Herbert Oakeley's desire to disseminate musical knowledge. The programme commenced with Martin Luther's grand chorale, "Ein' feste Burg," in evident allusion to the fourth centenary of the great Reformer. In Handel's air for soprano, an adaptation from one of the operas, the stops used appeared to be a combination of oboes, clarionets, and horns, which absolutely "sang" the melody. In the fugue, for organ, which followed, the fine counterpoint of the "Saxon Giant," was listened to with special satisfaction by true lovers of organ music; although Haydn's far more obvious and more comprehensible air and chorus were, as might be expected, more acceptable to so mixed an audience. Mozart's highly-impassioned andante was redemanded, but not repeated; the protracted applause, however, after Beethoven's exquisite morceau (Op. 14) seemed to indicate that the audience would brook no denial, and the encore was complied with. The staccato contrasted to the legato effects seemed to be especially appreciated. The movement from a quartet by Spohr, so effective and so elaborately developed, was again more acceptable to those of the more musical portion of listeners; but Hummel's "Melody," or air for variations in his Septuor, seemed to suit all tastes. Gluck's Gavotte caused quite a furore, and on the applause subsiding the Professor played another of those popular movements by Handel. The recital concluded with one of the most effective pieces sung at the concerts of the University Musical Society—Bishop's admirable setting of Sir Walter Scott's lines in "The Lady of the Lake," in which all contrasts of light and shade, fortissimo, and its dying echoes, were introduced on the magnificent organ. Perhaps no recital in the music classroom has ever given more general satisfaction.

BRISTOL.

An organ recital was given by Mr. George Riseley in the Colston Hall, Bristol, on Saturday, November 24th. The following was the programme:—

Overture, "Occasional"	Handel.
Andante, Allegro, Adagio, March.
Andante from the Symphony in C minor	Beethoven.
Organ Sonata, No. 4, in B flat	Mendelssohn.
Allegro, Andante Religioso, Allegretto, Allegro.
Adagio in B flat	Spohr.
Sonata No. 9, in A	Corelli.
Air, "Magnus Dominus"	Cimarosa.
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini.

And on Saturday, December 1st:—

Offertoire in G major	Wely.
Andante from the 5th Symphony	Beethoven.
Organ Sonata, No. 3, in A	Mendelssohn.
Allegro with Choral in Pedal—Andante.
Bourree in E minor, and Gavotte in E major	Bach.
Funeral March et Chant Seraphique	Guilmant.
Serenade et Gavotte, "Olivia"	Boeckel.
Overture, "Don Pasquale"	Donizetti.

BIRMINGHAM.

Mr. C. J. B. Meacham, Mus. Bac., Oxon., organist of St. Philip's Church, Birmingham, gave an organ recital in Holy Trinity Church, Birchfields, on November 29th. The following was the programme:—

Overture, "Samson"	Handel.
Adagio (1st Symphony)	Haydn.
Cujus Animam	Rossini.
Slow Movement, "Maid of Orleans"	Bennett.
Allegro Vivace	Morandi.
Adagio (Scotch Symphony)	Mendelssohn.
Carillons de Dunkerque	Cattet.
Coronation March	Meyerbeer.

Mr. Samuel Gee read a paper before the College of Organists on Tuesday last; particulars of which will be given next week.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

XV.

O the student who has honestly and carefully prepared himself for the work of part-writing by practising the various contrapuntal types in 2, 3, and 4 parts, there is but little to say with regard to the construction of counterpoint in 5, 6, 7, and 8 parts. In truth, the obvious and necessary relaxation of the rules increases in proportion with the number of parts employed; and such relaxation of the laws governing part action is productive of no bad effect, inasmuch as the ear loses the power of tracing out the progress of the parts when more than four are used. However great the results may seem to be in increased richness and dignity from a score having more than four parts, it is questionable whether the employment of such a score does not involve as a rule a more than counterbalancing loss of perspicuity and well defined tone outlines. The greatest masters in their works for 6 and 8 parts have practically endorsed this view by a frequent division of the parts for antiphonal use, and by rarely writing for a large number of parts with that degree of strictness which justifies the technical expression—"Counterpoint in "6, 7, or 8 real parts." The effect of a large number of parts moving independently may be aptly compared with the corresponding appeal to the brain which would be made through the eye, by the undue exertions involved in watching the course of a large number of independent objects or lines. Just as the eye resents such a strain upon its powers and in self-defence, as it were, groups the different objects or lines in a small number of general masses, so the ear declines to follow excessive part activity, and merely accepts the general, richly combined effects of the harmony. So it is needless to spend too much time or thought upon a species of contrapuntal activity, which for most practical purposes may be fairly called superfluous. All the same, the student will do well to essay some practice in the conduct of counterpoint employing 6, 7, and 8 parts; and such practice will not only be found useful in occasional choral effects, but it will have an undoubted use in the art of scoring for an orchestra, in which clearness of contrapuntal vision not only helps the composer to write with rapidity and perspicuity, but enables him to realise with advantage the best distribution of the elements of widely spread harmonies. The chief directions in which the laws are relaxed in favour of the composer in scoring for a large number of parts are naturally with regard to the more nearly allowed proximity of consecutive perfect concords, and it may be added greater license in the treatment of discords, in the way especially of being able with some impunity to transfer their solution to other parts moving close at hand. The first important concession with regard to the progression of perfect concords is the permission to [illegible] not external, to proceed in contrary motion to octaves, as here in ascent and descent:—

Digitized by Google

and

E\A/D\G
E/A\D/G.

So far from such progression having in 6 occasionally or frequently in 7 or 8 parts a bad effect, they thin the harmony with gain, and strengthen, by a species of allowable doubling, a sequential figure to which strength and prominence may be rightfully and effectually given. E. H. TURPIN.

ON THE ORIGIN OF THE WORD "MASS."

To Church musicians of all branches of the Church, the origin of the word at the head of this leaderette is a matter of some interest, especially as furnishing the familiar title of the Communion Service of the Roman branch of the Church, the musical setting of which supplies probably the richest departmental treasure of Church music the world has yet known and which has been contributed to by all the greatest continental musicians with the exception of HANDEL and MENDELSSOHN. A recent consideration of the question prompts the present words. Authorities of the Roman Church have, without speaking ex cathedrâ, traced the word to the dismissal at the end of the Service pronounced by the officiating priest in the words—"Ite "missa est," and sung to plain song notes at High Mass liberally adorned by graceful Pneuma figures. This sentence is answered by the words, "Deo "gratias," doubtless an expression of thankfulness for the privileges vouchsafed in the greatest of sacrifices, of which the Communion Service—accepted by Christians of all shades of belief as a Divine ordinance—furnishes a commemorative type. The word "Missa," or "Mass" as familarly rendered in English in the sentence alluded to, is of course a verbal use of the word forming the root of our words mission (Latin missio), missionary, etc. So it is possible that its employment as the designation of the Communion Office of the Roman Church had originally a wider application than the explanation already quoted seems to offer; that is, it might be intended as expressive of the act of spreading "the glad "tidings" to be preached to all the nations by means of the central idea of religious faith, "sacrifice." It is possible, however, that the name "Mass" might have an inferential application from the English language itself to the Roman Communion Office, having reference to the doctrine of transubstantiation or "real presence." The word "Mass" as used in England for many centuries would seem however to be only a corruption of the Latin missa, and as such possesses little or no etymological interest. The word "mass" in its ordinary meaning is derived it may be from the corresponding Latin massa, and has no connection with the word as used in a religious sense. The Anglican Church has therefore done wisely in adopting the words "Holy Communion" as the simple, expressive designation of the sacred office.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

On Monday last, at a meeting of the Musical Association, Mr. W. H. Cummings in the chair, Mr. E. Behnke threw on a screen by means of the oxy-hydrogen light, some marvellous photographs of his own vocal cords and soft palate in the act of singing, which had been taken under the joint direction of himself and Mr. Lennox Browne, and he read a paper descriptive of the photographic process, and of the lessons taught by these photographs. Mr. Behnke said that one objection which had been urged against the use of the laryngoscope in vocal art was proved to be groundless, viz., that by it the vocal organs were distorted, since his photographs showed that he was able to keep his tongue flat in his mouth, thereby preventing the disturbance of the vocal organs. The lecturer also claimed to have proved by these photographs that the false vocal cords have nothing whatever to do with tone-production. He pointed out the influence exerted over the pitch and quality of tone by the soft palate, particularly showing how nasal tone was caused, and how it might be prevented. At the conclusion of a highly instructive paper, Mr. Behnke gave a laryngoscopic demonstration of the various points mentioned in his lecture. Signor Garcia, Signor Randegger, and many other members of the association availed themselves of the opportunity of verifying the photographs in the throat of the lecturer, who, at Signor Randegger's special request, sang in different registers and on different vowels. Mr. Behnke also proved that his explanation of the enormous influence of the soft palate upon the voice is perfectly correct, and he concluded his intensely interesting demonstration by vocalising, with the laryngial mirror at the back of the throat. There was a spirited discussion, and the usual votes of thanks to the lecturer and to the chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

CHURCH CHOIRS.

At the recent "Church Workers' Festival" at Canterbury, Dr. LONGHURST read an excellent paper on the burning questions concerning Church choirs, in the course of which he observed :—

What is understood now-a-days by church choirs? Some will answer, "A very tiresome lot of people, very difficult to deal with, especially when possessed of the little knowledge that is dangerous." (Laughter.) Others will say, "An egotistical body of amateur musicians, associated together for the purpose, not so much of assisting at Divine worship, as for the mere selfish gratification of being known as the professed and acknowledged leaders of the congregation." (Renewed laughter.) And this remark, "leaders of the congregation," induces me to say that I consider that to be their legitimate function, and as such should be felt by them as an important privilege. (Hear, hear.) The chief points we ought to touch upon are these :—1. The efficiency of church choirs; 2. The esprit de corps with which they should be animated; 3. The mode of rehearsals; 4. How individual members can aid and help forward the movement. As to efficiency, a justifiable emulation is, I think, quite excusable if in the right direction; not as in some choirs, where you meet with a man whose object is to make himself heard above all the others, but the emulation which prompts the desire to try and do all to the praise and glory of God. Much good may be accomplished and the true esprit-d'corps maintained, if the organist or choir-master throw himself into the work as heartily as the choir, and if at the rehearsals, he, as well as they, be actuated by one and the same feeling. No desire of novelty should induce them to be continually craving for fresh music, but rather a wish to perform that which is allotted to them in as perfect and devotional a manner as possible. (Hear, hear.) We all know how difficult a thing it is to persuade choirmen and boys out of the notion that because they know (as they consider) a certain chant, hymn, or anthem that there is no need of rehearsal. (Hear, hear.) This is one of the many stumbling-blocks which beset choir training, but it should not be allowed to impede the improvements which a regular course of practices by all parties concerned would eventually bring about. In some parishes it is customary to hold all the rehearsals in the church, in others in the school-room. I do not think either a good plan. If the first be adopted, the practice should be conducted with great care, the proper reverence for sacred things being imperilled. I do not think it a good plan to hold all the rehearsals in the church, especially when new music has to be learnt. If the harmonium or pianoforte be available in the school-room, by all means let that be the place for practice, and then, when all the parts are fairly correct, another rehearsal in the church might render all more satisfactory and more devotional. (Hear, hear.) Of the choice of music, too, it will be expected that I should say something. It is generally known that most Cathedral men are averse to what is called Gregorian music, which is, at least to my mind, music without music—for where music is intended as a help to devotion, I fail to see or allow that that help can possibly be rendered by the music people call Gregorian. (Hear, hear, and No.) We might as well hold up Chaucer as the most elegant of all writers, and expect all our modern poets to imitate him. (Laughter.) I think too that much of the Anglican music, if of too florid a character, is open to objection. (Hear, hear.) The recent improvement in congregational singing is mainly due to the excellent and careful manner in which the various hymn-books are now printed; taking first the most popular, "Hymns Ancient and Modern," Barnby's "Hymnary," Sullivan's "Church Hymns," and many others. There is now no excuse for having bad tunes, or good tunes tortured by bad harmony, for all possible care has been bestowed on these and other similar works. Speaking somewhat critically, I should say that in the later edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," the editors have gone too far (if possible) in the expression marks. What village organist, with a small one-manual organ, could possibly make all the changes of tone indicated by the numerous p's and f's (to say nothing of the crescendos and diminuendos), which abound in the last verse of No. 222, and Nos. 91 and 256. In No. 223, the first tune does not require nearly so many as the 2nd, although the same words are used. That danger to the general effect is imminent may be clearly proved; for if the organist attempts to make the changes thus indicated, he loses much tone by repeatedly leaving the manuals to shift his stops; and if he does not do so, the choir, after having been drilled to observe these marks by some perhaps over-fastidious choir-master, either lose confidence in their organist, or sing with an utter disregard to effect. Let me not be misunderstood in this matter. I am not advocating a system of disregarding these excellent marks of expression (which are, if properly rendered, great helps to devotion), but rather giving my opinion that if a less number of marks had been used, greater attention to them would have been paid. Much has been said and written for and against the introduction of female singers into the choir; it is now often thought that boys are the only trebles and altos we ought to have. If good singers can be so obtained I think it may be considered better, and in such churches where a surpliced choir is established it is often necessary, but even in such choirs the female part of the congregation should be invited to attend the rehearsals regularly, and in the services these valuable adjuncts would materially help the congregation in joining them to sound forth the glory and praise of God.

After quoting scriptural and musical authority for the judicious employment of female singers, Dr. Longhurst observed :—

We have then the prototype of such grand services which we have had in our glorious cathedral of Canterbury during the last few years, when the finest oratorios by the greatest composers have drawn together such large congregations (some thousands) that have never—as far as we have record—been equalled. And on these special occasions where would our small choristers' voices have been heard had they not been supported (ay and strongly supported) by female voices? Where would our altos' weak voices have been heard had they not been equally supported by female voices? Among the hopeful signs of better things are the occasional festivals in our cathedrals and parish churches. Several I could mention, not only in town, emulated by the noble example set by our metropolitan cathedral, St. Paul's, but also in the country, and frequently in Canterbury, where we have had, as on the occasion of the recent enthronement, a special service of praise (Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang") with a mixed choir, instruments, and organ; and thus drawing together an immense congregation of worshippers. These signs of better things point, let us hope, to the ultimate restoration of the oratorio to its true home—the church—and this grand movement must depend in its onward progress to no small extent upon the judicious employment of female voices, not to the exclusion of boys' voices, but to the beautifying and rounding off the mass of vocal tones. (Hear, hear.) It is rather to be regretted that certain High Church authorities will recognize no high pitched voices save those of rough country lads, who may have had, during several weeks, no other mode of practising their vocal organs, than that obtained by screaming in the cornfields and orchards as living scarecrows. (Laughter.) By an infusion of female voices the rough tone of these country lads would be greatly ameliorated, and the congregation most grateful for such a real blessing, saving them all the ear-splitting, which is, in some of the rural districts, truly distressing. (Hear, hear.) What I have advanced has not been the result of a passing impression, but that of mature judgment; for, without egotism, I may safely assert that very few men have had more, or even as much, experience in training choir boys than I have had. Commencing (when a mere boy myself) in 1836 as an assistant to my late esteemed friend, Mr. Jones, I have ever since that period had the charge of the cathedral choristers, and although here, as elsewhere, the inevitable weakness which occasionally pervades all choristers in cathedral or parish choirs will present itself when a number of big boys either leave for some better appointment or lose their voices by age (as at the present time when all my boys are, as some say, mere babies), still I think most of those whom I have now the honour of addressing will acknowledge that the Canterbury Cathedral choristers have held, and I trust will yet again hold their own by the side of other boys who have not greater advantages of birth or education than we have in our choir. Unfortunately for me, our boys are far worse off in this respect than any other. In conclusion, I may perhaps be allowed to offer a few suggestions on what I consider to be the proper management of church choirs. Keep the choirmen in good temper if possible. I say this in all sincerity, for musicians are, most unfortunately, proverbially cranky (if such a word be admissible); take particular care that the music selected for service, be it chant, hymn-tune, or anthem, be suitable to the psalm, hymn, or season. Let the choirmen have a sufficient quantity of new music for practice to keep down that egotistic feeling (to which allusion has been made in this paper) of being able to sing anything at sight; so few amateurs possess this gift. Let the rehearsals be regular and in every sense good practices, and so a real pleasure to those who take part in them. Make it a sine qua non that every member of the choir (unless prevented by illness, or some other cogent reason) should be present at least at three-fourths of the rehearsals, and those members who cannot so attend advise to retire from the choir. Rest assured these are most important things in the working of church choirs, and I trust these hints may be received in the same spirit of toleration by which they are prompted. (Applause.)

Unhappily, in accordance with the general clerical belief that, whether they understand the subject under consideration or not, the clergy are born to do all the talking in the world and perhaps anxious to stifle all artistic development in the Church, several of the clergy present having little or nothing to say of value (probably in their hearts dreading the growth of Church music) indulged in the customary inane observations and feeble efforts to provoke a smile, and chirped generally in much too characteristic a vein of clerical drivel anent musical matters.

The Rev. T. HIRST (rector of Bishopsbourne) remarked that he preferred Anglican music, but he thought they must allow Gregorian music fair play and toleration. (Hear, hear.) It was evident that parish choirs stood in need of improvement. He read in the Standard on the previous Monday that the Archbishop of Canterbury was about to move in the Lower House of Convocation for the appointment of a committee to consider what could be done to raise the tone of parish choirs. This showed that the question was rapidly becoming a "burning" one. (Hear, hear.) The great points to be aimed at were reverence in church, regularity in practice, and devotion in the lives of the choir men and boys themselves. The services should be made as congregational as possible; and anyone who aimed at anything lower than that made a great and fatal mistake. (Hear, hear.)

So far so good; and had the reverend gentleman sat down at this point, his opening sensible remarks would not have suffered by a too close proximity to the following sublime twaddle, which was only relieved by a proper recognition of a sense of duty, in the statement regarding his worthy to be followed example of constantly attending choir practices. The speaker

Understood that Dr. Longhurst approved of ladies singing in parish choirs; but he (Mr. Hirst) must confess that he did not approve of it. He did not think the place for ladies was in the parish chancel. (Hear, hear.) He liked to hear their sweet voices in the congregation, but he did not, he confessed, care to have ladies in the choir of the parish church, especially if two or three of them happened, as they did in his case, to be rather good looking. (Laughter.) After a short residence at Bishopsbourne he determined to speedily get rid of these young ladies. He called them together. He invited them to tea (laughter), and told them there was to be a surpliced choir. The girls retired, but they had always been good friends. He gave each of them a little present at parting (laughter), and the whole matter was amicably arranged. Having got rid of the young ladies, the thing was to supply their places. There were numbers of boys who, at the age of eight or nine, could, after a little training, be placed in the choir as chorister boys; and he endeavoured to select as choirmen men of moral lives, fairly well educated, and with a small knowledge of music. In his parish, with a population of 320, he had a choir of twelve men and twelve boys (applause); and he thought every clergyman might obtain a fair choir so far as numbers were concerned. If the incumbent did not attend the practices regularly, depend upon it the choir would become irregular. He had been connected with church choirs for thirty years, and during that period he had never, except in cases of illness or absence on his annual holiday, left his choir practices unattended. (Applause.) The best hymnal was the Ancient and Modern one, but when they had gone through it he did not think they would find more than thirty really good tunes. (Oh.) Whenever they heard of a good tune they should get it, and adapt it to their own hymns. It might be a good thing to have an anthem in a parish church, but he objected to anthems strongly as an inducement to the choir to persevere in its practice. He also objected very much to solos and duets. Every choir, he thought, should have an annual outing; if a clergyman did not give his choir a treat once a year he was a very shabby fellow. (Hear, hear, and laughter.)

The BISHOP OF DOVER mentioned that in one church in the diocese the lady singers were placed behind a lattice, and it could not be seen whether they had the features of Venus or of Medusa.

Surely these gentlemen, who thought fit thus to twaddle about the attractions of pretty faces and air their nonsensical leanings towards mediæval monasticism with regard to the presence of women in church, did not desire it to be supposed they were personally liable to the distractions which, arising from the near presence of pretty faces, create sentiment in the mundane minds of overgrown school boys? If these observations were intended for other people, such remarks were still in the worst possible taste. Alas! that an opportunity for the serious consideration of a vital topic should have been swamped by such time-wasting trifling as this! However, it is to be devoutly hoped that the organist of Canterbury Cathedral and others who are in earnest with regard to this very important subject, will not rest, but will again and again press for a full examination of the constitution and requirements of the Church choir. It is a pleasure to note that Mr. W. de Manby Sergison will presently read a paper bearing upon the subject before the members of the College of Organists. May such efforts for the consideration and opportunities for the discussion of the highest and purest thing we have as the production of men's hearts and minds, Church music, multiply and bear good fruit from day to day. This will be the earnest wish of every Christian thinker and large-minded Churchman who is climbing Zion's hill, with the motto "Excelsior" upon the banner of faith and hope. E. H. T.

There is to be, it is reported, English opera in London in January next.

THE SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

On December 1st, the Society of Professional Musicians held their meeting in the Mayor's Parlour, Town Hall, Southport. The chairman was Mr. Henry Watson, Mus. Bac., of Manchester; and amongst the members present were Dr. G. Marsden, Dr. Henry Hiles, Mr. J. Wrigley, R.A.M., Mr. J. Marsden, and Mr. C. B. Grundy, all of Manchester; Dr. H. Fisher, of Blackpool; Mr. W. D. Hall and Mr. James J. Monk, of Liverpool; Mr. James Dawber, Mus. Bac, (honorary secretary), Wigan; Mr. J. M. Field, of Bolton; Mr. George Clafton, of Oldham; and Messrs. Hinchcliffe and H. Hawkins, of Southport.

The minutes of the previous meeting, held at Manchester, were confirmed.

The SECRETARY reported that the Revisional Committee appointed at the last meeting to revise the examination scheme, had met. It was at first thought that it would take more than one meeting to get through the work, but it turned out that the members had been working privately, and when they came together they found the road pretty clear, and in a little over three hours went through the whole book, largely augmenting the lists of pieces by which candidates might be examined, and adding several compositions of well-known members. Other branches came in for a considerable share of alteration. They were now at work on the final proof, and the work was expected to appear in a saleable form shortly. The Committee decided, after a long discussion, that books should be published at half-a-crown, as the previous price was reckoned too high.

On the motion of Dr. HILES, seconded by Dr. MARSDEN, a cordial vote of thanks was given to Senior Risegari, and Mr. H. Smith, of Manchester, for their valuable assistance in the preparation of a scheme for instruction in violin and violoncello playing.

On the motion of Dr. MARSDEN, seconded by Mr. J. J. MONK, "The best thanks of the meeting were given to the Revisional Committee for their services in completing the examination scheme."

Mr. FIELD moved that members be allowed to vote by proxy. He said his object in proposing that, was to give outside professional musicians some inducement to join the Society, and thus extend its usefulness.

Mr. GRUNDY seconded the motion.

Dr. FISHER thought if that resolution were passed it would be unfair to those who were in the habit of attending the meetings; if members were allowed to vote by proxy they would probably never attend. If a restriction were put upon the application of the rule, it would perhaps serve a better purpose, for instance, if voting by proxy were only allowed when the member who did so was more than thirty or forty miles from the place of meeting.

Dr. HILES believed that that plan was not the proper way to give members an interest in the Society. He thought a system of branch societies would answer the purpose better.

Mr. J. WRIGLEY thought that the great charm which the Society had for him was because by attending its councils he was enabled to meet so many gentlemen of his profession; and he did not see that it could in any way be useful to members who did not go to its meetings, because they could not then profit by any of the debates, and thus would lose almost altogether the benefits to be derived from membership.

After further discussion, Mr. FIELD withdrew his motion.

It was moved by Mr. MONK, seconded by Mr. HALL, and agreed that the Secretary be requested to arrange for a meeting of professional musicians, either at Leicester, or Nottingham, or Birmingham, during the Christmas holidays, with a view of, by inducing professional men to join, extending the usefulness of the Society; and that members of the Society in this part of the country be invited to attend the meeting, for the purpose of co-operating with the Secretary for that object.

It was decided that all subjects for discussion, and any proposed resolution, should be stated in the circular convening each meeting; and that no vote be taken upon any other subject.

The next general meeting of the Society was arranged to take place in Liverpool in February next, and Dr. Fisher was appointed chairman.

On the motion of Dr. HILES, seconded by Dr. FISHER, the best thanks of the meeting were given to the Mayor for his kindness in permitting the Society to hold their council in his parlour.

The Church Oratorio Society sang Spohr's "Last Judgment" at Oxley Church, Bushey, on Dec. 3rd. Mr. J. Turpin, Mus.Bac., conducted, and the organist was Mr. E. H. Turpin. The music was attentively listened to by a congregation which filled the church.

"Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be performed in its entirety with organ accompaniment only at St. Paul's, Bow Common, on Friday evening, Dec. 14th, at 8 p.m., by the choir of the church alone, under the direction of Mr. Horace Buttery. On Christmas Eve the usual Christmas selection from the "Messiah" of Handel will be rendered in the same way.

Reviews.

Glee, The Three Tapers. By M. L. Gordon. (H. Davies, 19, Treherne-road, Brixton).—This is not, as its title would seem to suggest, a roaring Bacchanalian piece. But it concerns the praise of good wine in a seemly and graceful verbal and musical fashion. The piece is written for alto, two tenors, and bass. It is accompanied obbligato. The different voices have solos, and the pieces have several distinct movements. The writing is fluent, bold, effective, and interesting, and the piece will be duly valued by our many choirs of men's voices as a spirited contribution to the store of glees of the more modern type.

The Praise of Jehovah. Jubilee cantata. By Weber; English version by F. W. Rosier. (Goodwin and Tabb, 71, Great Queen-street, W.C.; Lamborn Cock, 23, Holles Street; J. Curwen, 8, Warwick Lane).—A new edition of this characteristic and effective work clearly and handsomely printed for 1s 6d, with a well-arranged pianoforte accompaniment, having the orchestration marked thereon. A Tonic Sol-fa edition is printed; and the orchestral parts may be had of the obliging music librarians, Messrs. Goodwin and Tabb, whose address has just been given.

Christmas Hymns and Carols. Edwin Lemare. (Weekes and Co.).—A dozen settings of Mrs. Gaskell's words, printed together or separately as required. Both melodies and harmonies are good, while being in a natural and not severe style. Some, as "Lullaby," "Christ is born," and "Hosannah," are excellent specimen of the carol type.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Max Josef Beer is writing a new comic opera, entitled "Der Pfeifenkönig."

A new opera, "L'Antiquario," music by Dessy, has been produced at Cagliari.

Grammann's opera, "Das Andreasfest" has been very successfully given in Augsburg.

Rubinstein's receipts at his three recent concerts in Berlin, are said to have been enormous.

Délibes' "Lakmé" was performed at Frankfort-on-Main, on Dec. 3rd, with a German translation by Herr Gumbert.

A bust of Peter Benoit has been presented to the Duke of Campofelice by the Belgian composer's friends and admirers.

Mackenzie's "Colomba" has been accepted by the directors of the Vienna Opera House, Mdme. Pauline Lucca being engaged for the title rôle.

There are now four weekly orchestral Sunday concerts in Paris, with orchestras of 70 or 80 players each. These performances are continued over seven months of the year.

A new comic opera in three acts, "Una Congiura," by A. Biagi, professor of the piano at the local Instituto Musicale, has been produced at the Teatro Niccolini, Florence.

Ludwig Meinardus' oratorio, "Luther in Worms," gave so much satisfaction, on the 7th and 9th November, in Elberfeld, that the managing committee presented him with 300 marks.

The Musical Society of Rotterdam announce a forthcoming performance of Handel's "Saul," with additional accompaniments by the well known composer F. Gernsheim, the conductor of the Society.

A new comic opera called "Spanish Students," by a Danish composer, named Langemüller, has been played several times at Copenhagen, with extraordinary success. The work is said to be after the style of "Carmen."

M. Georges Auvray, at the head of an excellent orchestra, is taking a provincial tour with a répertoire of new works by Delibes, Massenet, Widor, and other rising French composers. Rouen, Havre, Caen, Orleans, Chartres, Amiens, and other towns will have the benefit of this admirable undertaking.

Herr Max Friedländer, the baritone, has discovered some valuable Schubert manuscripts, amongst others, a part of the music to "Rosamunde." The newly found pieces are soon to be performed by the Vienna Philharmonic Society.

Berlioz's great Te Deum, first produced at the Church of St. Eustache, Paris, in 1855, under the direction of its composer, and not heard since, was performed in the Cathedral of Bordeaux recently, with a band and chorus numbering 1,000.

From Zwambeck is announced the death of the famous dance music composer, Josef Gungl, aged 73. This report has been seemingly corrected by the statement that the deceased composer was Johann Gungl, a relative of the more famous Josef Gungl.

Robert Volckman, who died last October, has left a parcel of manuscripts labelled "Unpublished Compositions," which contains, with other smaller works, two sonatas for piano, a duo for piano and violin, a string quartet, and the music to a dramatic fairy tale, entitled "Midas."

The death is announced of Ludwig Erk, a popular Berlin composer, whose part-songs and vocal music for schools are in much repute in Germany. He was in receipt of a life pension of £150 from the municipality of Berlin in consideration of his services rendered to the art in the national schools.

The announcement is made that Mr. Max Pauer, son of the well-known and esteemed London professor, E. Pauer, recently played with great success at Frankfort, and he was invited to play Chopin's E minor concerto at Heidelberg on the 15th ult. He is also announced to appear at Mainz, Darmstadt, Mannheim, and in other places.

The oldest living German musician is Herr Hild, a former member of the town band at the watering place of Elsler, who celebrated last month his 100th birthday. In company with his sons and grandsons, who would seem to have inherited his talent for music, he may still occasionally be seen taking part in the town band performances.

Herr Pollini, director of the Hamburg Theatre, has offered Anton Rubinstein the sum of £15,000 for 100 concerts, to be given during a tour of five months in the United States. The composer has not as yet, however, accepted this munificent offer. Joachim, Sarasate, and a great many other well known artists will go next year to the "land of dollars."

Says The Monthly Musical Record.—The commission de l'Opéra-Populaire, appointed by the Municipal Council of Paris, has unanimously decided that a subvention of 300,000 francs should be given to M. Lagrené, the director of the Théâtre du Château d'Eau. If the Council ratifies the decision of the Commission, a long discussed question will at last be settled, the unprecedented of an existing establishment being resorted to instead of the foundation of a new one. The subvention is granted only for the year 1883-4, and under the condition that six first sujets, approved of by the Council will be engaged before the 1st of January. When shall we hear of similar actions by our municipal authorities? The object of the Paris Municipal Council is, of course, to ensure good operatic entertainments for the people at reasonable prices.

No more earnest worker for the poor can be found than Mrs. W. H. Monk (wife of Dr. W. H. Monk of King's College), who earnestly pleads for the Cottage Mission in East London, to help feed hundreds who are so wretched, and hungry! The only dinner in any week that they ever have is the "Irish Stew Dinner," prepared for a swarming crowd of nearly naked, starving children, by Mr. Austin and his ready helpers! Funds are urgently needed to prevent the recurrence of the heartrending calamity of last winter, when upon one occasion there was nothing in hand to provide material, and the poor, despairing, famishing children could not be made to believe that they must go away unfed! Even one penny will be thankfully received by the founder of these Irish Stew Dinners, Mr. Walter Austin, of 44, Finsbury Pavement, E.C. Musical people, who stand brightly forth as among the best servers of charity, will surely help in a cause so good, in some way or other.

ANCIENT ORGAN IN THE DUOMO OF ORVIETO, TUSCANY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD"

DEAR SIR,—When travelling in Italy during the winter of last year, I visited, among other small towns of the interior, the decayed old city of Orvieto, distant within two hours' journey from Rome. The grand old cathedral, with its magnificent stalls, altar-pieces and screens, and its noble frescoes by Signorelli, contains, in addition to these and other works of art, a fine organ of great size, placed in a gallery in the north transept, and reaching nearly to the vaulting. Having at that time almost completed my large work on organ-cases and the art-archæology of the instrument generally, and being thoroughly enthusiastic on the subject of old organs, I persuaded the sacristan to admit me and my friend to the organ-loft, reached by a spiral staircase from the sacristy. Like nearly all Italian organ-cases, this one presented a flat front, the space between the side pilasters and the top entablature being divided up into compartments, containing pipes of various sizes, from two or three feet to 40 feet in length, the group of the 32 feet metal diapasons standing majestically in the centre. The total height of the case was about 70 feet, and from the details of the architecture I judged the work to date from C. 1570 or 1580, and from what I saw of the internal mechanism, &c., I have little doubt that the greater part of it belongs to the same period.

The bellows are, as usual in old organs, placed away from the instrument, and in this case, were situated in the triforium passage, but being out of order, and detached from the trunks, I was unable to play as I had wished.

There is but one row of keys, CC to G, 56 notes, of which the upper few have, doubtless, been added in modern times, and 11 octaves of pedals, of which the upper half octave is minus sharps. The stops are drawn by means of levers, placed in double rows on either side of the manual, and move from right to left, and not up and down as in other old examples I have seen. The following is the list of stops, as indicated by labels placed under the levers:—

1. Tromba di 16 piedi bassi.
2. Tromba di 16 piedi sopra.
3. Tomba di 8 piedi bassi.
4. Clarinetto soprani.
5. Clarone bassi.
6. Trombe soprani.
7. Violono soprani.
8. Cornetto soprani.
9. Ottavino soprani.
10. Corni dolci soprani.
11. Flauti in 8 bassi.
12. Flauti in 8 soprani.
13. Flauti traverso soprani.
14. Voce umana soprani.

PEDALIERA.

15. Gran 16 piedi.
16. Gran 8 piedi.
17. Quintationi.
18. Otti registri di pieno.
19. Bimbardone.
20. Bombarde.
21. Timballi.

On the right-hand side:—

22. 32 piedi basso.
23. 32 piedi soprano.
24. 16 piedi basso.
25. 16 piedi soprano.
26. Principale basso.
27. Principale soprano.
28. Bordone basso.
29. Bordone soprano.
30. VIII prime bassi.
31. 8 prime soprani.
32. 8 secondo bassi.
33. 8 secondo soprano.
34. 12 bassi.
35. 12 e 15.
36. 15 e 19.
37. 22 e 26.
38. 22 e 29.
39. 29, 33, e 36.
40. Raddoppio di 4 regis.
41. Raddoppio di 3 regis.
42. Unione di Pedale.

As I was unable to play the organ I cannot say which of the above belonged to the pedal, and which to the manual, but am inclined to think that all, with the exception of the first fourteen, belong to the pedal!

As the duomo, like so many other churches throughout Europe (England certainly not excepted), is suffering severely from the modern craze of "restoration," it is likely that this old organ will not long survive the renovating powers, or will, at any rate, be rebuilt internally, so I think the above description will be worth recording, and be of interest to your readers.

I found but few fine organ-cases in Italy, and none that can be compared with some of the magnificent works I have seen in Germany and France; but there are three or four very beautiful examples at Siena, the work of Baldassare Peruzzi, in the Ospedale della Scala, the Palazzo Publico, and the Duomo. These date from the beginning of the 16th century. I have made drawings of them.

Faithfully yours,

ARTHUR G. HILL, F.S.A.

Junior Oxford and Cambridge Club, Nov. 26, 1883.

At the recent festivities at Sandringham in honour of the birthday of H. R. H. the Princess of Wales, the Duke of Albany's new valse was played by the band of the Norfolk Artillery.

Passing Events.

King David is to be given at the first concert of Mr. Willing's choir.

Mr. E. H. Morris is giving a series of popular concerts in the Victoria Hall, Plymouth.

Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" was performed in St. George's Hall, Bradford, last week.

The Royal Academy of Music has now some 500 students, with a very large yearly revenue.

"The Golden Ring" was successfully produced at the re-opening of the Alhambra on Monday last.

Spohr's "Last Judgment" was to be sung in the Leeds Parish Church, on Friday evening, Dec. 7th, and the choir to be augmented for the occasion.

At St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, Fenchurch Street, Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be sung on Friday next the 14th inst. after 7.30, under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

M. Pachmann kindly gave a recital at the Royal Academy of Music the other day. He was assisted by an English lady pianist, of whom it is said we shall hear more presently.

A new and spirited paper called The London Musical Critic, for December, not only includes interesting literary matter, but an effective "Festal March" by Mr. G. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac.

The subject of David has engaged the attention of three English composers, Charles Horsley, Dr. W. H. Longhurst (1871) whose work has not yet been printed in a complete form, and Mr. G. A. Macfarren (1883).

At a recent meeting of the governors of Heriot's Hospital, Edinburgh, it was unanimously resolved "That instruction in the theory and practice of music in the out-door schools should, in future, be made continuous and systematic."

A chief element in the success of Berlioz's "Requiem" at the Crystal Palace on Saturday last, was the employment of a chorus of students from the R.A.M. This was a notable gain. We sadly need the development of professional choruses in England.

St. Cecilia Magazine for Dec., has an interesting and appreciative account of the life and works of the English composer, Dr. Samuel Arnold, (1739—1802); who wrote some excellent music, and whose oratorio "The Prodigal Son," at least deserves revival.

Readers will learn with sympathetic regret that Mr. Frederic Clay was on Tuesday night seized with paralysis whilst walking in Bow Street from the Alhambra Theatre, with his colleague in the production of "The Golded Ring," Mr. G. Sims. It is gratifying to add that the esteemed composer is improving.

At a meeting of the Committee acting in reference to the National Eisteddfod meetings held in Cardiff in August last, a final balance-sheet, which had been looked forward to with much interest, was presented. A large expenditure had been incurred in prizes offered in the different competitions; but, over and above the aggregate expenses, a credit balance of £140 was announced.

A. M. it seems was wrong in describing Lord Overstone as an attendant at the Musical Union Matinées. Lady Overstone and her daughter did attend, but Lord Overstone was never present, it is confidently asserted. The person mistaken for Lord Overstone by A. M. was the Rev. M. Goddard, a member of the Musical Union Committee, who was carried into the room when a confirmed invalid.

A small, but no less sure sign of the times, is the meeting of a number of clergymen of moderate doctrinal views in mid-London to discuss the vital question, Church music; and it is gratifying to add, mirabile dictu, the presence of a practical musician was thought to be not undesirable. It is earnestly to be hoped that such meetings will multiply, and that the clergy, who are beginning to open their eyes to the fact that Church music must be improved and advanced, will seriously add their great and legitimate influence in guiding and furthering the movement.

At the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, on Dec. 8th, Miss Augusta M. Draper was to give her fourth annual Matinée Musicale, with the assistance of her pupils, Miss Maude Ballard, Miss Fanny Coke, Miss Rosie Ballard, and the following artists:—vocalist, Mdme. Osborne Williams; solo clarionet, Mr. Lazarus; solo violoncello, Mr. William C. Hann, R.A.M.; solo pianoforte, Miss Augusta M. Draper, and Miss Emily Slade. Accompanist, Mr. R. Taylor. The programme includes a Weber Duet (Op. 48), for clarionet and pianoforte, and a Beethoven Trio for clarionet, violoncello, and pianoforte.

At St. George's Hall, Langham-place, an interesting amateur vocal and dramatic performance was given on the afternoon of Dec. 3rd, when Balfe's cantata "Mazeppa," which has recently created much interest, formed the first part of the programme, the remaining portion of which was appropriated to a new operetta, entitled "The Ferry Girl," the libretto of which is adapted from the French by the Dowager Marchioness of Downshire, the music being the composition of Lady Arthur Hill. The performances were given in aid of the funds of the parish church of Easthampstead (Berkshire).

Lady Brabazon gave a concert at the Brompton Hospital on Nov. 27th, in the handsome large hall, which was crowded with the patients. Mr. Ch. Bishenden gained encores for both his songs, "John Olden" was especially encored; Mrs. Bishenden uses her sweet and sympathetic voice to great advantage in the duets she sings with her husband. The songs of Miss Burdett always please; Miss Warburton sang in an artistic manner. Mr. Owens sang two of Sims Reeves' favourite songs, and Mr. Hubert Smith played two solos on the Broadwood grand in a highly-finished style. A vote of thanks to the performers was received with the greatest enthusiasm.

A glance at the advertisement columns in the last number of the Musical Standard will inform the reader that Mr. Charles E. Stephens' new Sonata for flute and pianoforte is to be introduced at the next meeting of the Musical Artists' Society on Dec. 15th. Mr. Stephens has treated wood-wind instruments in a remarkably original and effective manner—no facile feat. A sonata for the same instruments by the late Henry Westrop is extant, but such compositions seem to be rare. Mr. Stephens's overture, "A Dream of Happiness," has been recently played at Brighton with great éclat. More than a "dream," the overture is a reality.

A special matinée was given on Nov. 28th, at the Gaiety Theatre by Mr. Henry Nordblom, the well-known tenor of English opera companies. The first two acts of "Fra Diavolo" were given, Mr. Nordblom himself appearing as the principal character of the robber chief, in which he was supported by the singing of Miss Rose Hersee, Mr. Aynsley Cook, Mr. R. Temple, and Mr. Faulkner Leigh. The performance however did not by any means go smoothly, owing to an evident insufficiency of the rehearsal, and also to the ineffectual efforts of the lady who appeared as Lady Allcash to sing the difficult music allotted to that part. Mr. Joseph Maas sang in his own admirable way "Come into the garden, Maud," between the acts, and also, in response to an encore, "When other lips." Mr. Charles Warner gave a recitation, and there were some other miscellaneous items.

The critic of the Times says of Mr. Parry's new pianoforte quartet:—"It is a composition of high aim and serious import, free from any concession to the taste of the vulgar. Mr. Parry's motto is odi profanum vulgus; he is a composer for composers, and his works frequently appeal to the mind rather than the heart, even as do those of his favourite master and model, Brahms. By adding that, of the 4 movements, the Andante in D flat appears to be the most successful, we imply a high opinion of the composer's powers. It is in a slow movement that a musician's talent is put to the severest and most conclusive test. Mere learning or fanciful imagery avail little or nothing. Mr. Parry is further praised for his continuity, possessed by him in a rare degree, and this atones for a certain want of spontaneous utterance. If no single melodic phrase strikes the ear by its innate beauty, there is no flagging of inspiration from the opening notes to the fine climax to which the piece gradually rises; the first movement is said to be remarkable for its elaborate contrapuntal writing; the scherzo strikes the critic as fresh and lively, and the finale, with a resemblance to the item of the first allegro, as effective."

Ziegler.—Could any of your readers kindly inform me if there are pianoforte manufacturers by the name of "Ziegler." I have seen pianos bearing that name, and I believe they are manufactured in Paris.—C. B.

A correspondent writes in reference to a march, from Weber's opera, "Sylvana," arranged as a pianoforte duet, and published by Lamborn Cock. The key is A major. Can any one give the date and other particulars of this opera; the title is not familiar?—A. M.

London Organists.—For a list of the organists of the London Churches, I beg to refer "Harmonic Flute" to Mackeson's "Guide to the Churches of London and its Suburbs," published by Metzler and Co., 35, Great Marlborough Street and Parker and Co., 6, Southampton Street, Strand, price 1s. 6d. Besides the names of the organists and dates of appointment, there will be found in the guide much concise and useful information about the organ, choir, music, etc., at the various churches.—J. S. Bumpus.

A. W. H. may not use Barnett's trio, "The Magic Wove Scarf," in public, without payment of a certain trifling sum to purchaser of the copyright, whose name I forget. The musical copyright runs for thirty years after the composer's death, and I hope that John Barnett is still alive.—A. M.

"Ione."—This opera was composed by Petrelli. If E. A. Sutton will communicate direct with me I shall be most happy to give him every information I can. The opera is not, I believe, in print, but I have a copy that is available. —Fredk. W. Cooke, Graveley Hill, Birmingham.

THE

NATURAL LAWS OF "EXPRESSION" IN MUSICAL EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL DELIVERY, AND THEIR SYSTEMATICAL APPLICATION.*

By Eustace J. Breakespeare.

I.

In a paper which, a short time ago, I had the honour of reading before the Musical Association, on the subject of "Musical Æsthetics," I made passing reference to a work on Musical Expression, by the French writer Lussy,—"Traité de l'expression musicale." This I did in order to illustrate my argument that the philosophic side of music was not without its practical bearings. A very clever exposition of the Frenchman's views had been made some time before by Mr. J. S. Curwen. Mr. Curwen's paper, which was devoted entirely to M. Lussy and his treatise, hardly succeeded in gaining unqualified support to the theories of the latter. I was rather inclined, in making reference to Mr. Curwen in my paper, to find fault with the discussionists for misapprehending the writer's argument. After better reflection upon this subject, I began to see that, after all, the French author did not deserve such unbounded admiration and support as I myself at first was disposed to grant; although as a unique appearance in musical literature, I feel it is worthy of most careful consideration. What are the faulty points therein I hope to show. At the same time, although the subject of my present discourse obliges me at least to mention this book of Lussy, I wish it not to appear that I am concerned chiefly in making a new exposition of its doctrines. As far as is possible within the limits of a "paper," Mr. Curwen has already performed this exegetical task to perfection. Apart from the fact that to show ignorance or profess indifference to what is at present the best review of the most important, if not the only work on the subject I treat upon, would be unpardonable; reference to it (insomuch as I may perhaps presume upon a certain acquaintance with the "Traité") will help me better to express what I have to say upon my own responsibility. At the same time, then, that I guard against the possibility of my argument being bound up with Lussy's theories, I escape the charge of presumptuousness in going over Mr. Curwen's track again, which might fitly be laid against me if my paper were simply an exegesis of Lussy's work.

Without making much presumption upon previous acquaintance with this work, it may be remembered that the aim of the writer is to establish rules by which the expressive qualities of accent, rhythm, force, etc., in playing may be practically acquired; the grand objection being that any such regulation of musical expression would induce a mechanical delivery, quite opposed to all natural expression.

There is no doubt that such law-giving may be too arbitrary. Lussy observes that such and such observances in performance are common to players in general, and he tabulates them accordingly. Naturally it is demurred that like passages may be performed by different players, or by the same player at different times, in quite opposite ways.

To instance a few of his rules. He finds that single notes when occurring at weak parts of the bar, when carrying on the rhythm (i. e., when the other parts are stationary), are nevertheless accentuated. [This, by the way, is what is sometimes loosely termed syncopation; though properly syncopation is the union of notes belonging to different sections of the measure, the combined force of the two notes coming at the weak point of the measure; to be distinguished from simple displaced accent where the beats of the measure go on as ordinarily]. That in passages of slurred notes in couples, where the first note of the new couplet is a repetition of the final note of the preceding couplet, the accent is placed upon the repeated note. That a note preceded by a "silence" is strong. Then with respect to pathetic accent, as he terms it in distinction to metrical accent, he finds repeated notes are duly emphasized and demand a crescendo. That chromatic chords require enforcement. That enharmonic changes also call for enforced tone. That appoggiaturas are always accented. That dissonances always require greater vigour of attack. That a rallentando is made with any change in the sentiment of a piece from joyful to sad. That with a repeated figure, or sequence, the bass moving stepwise up or down, an accelerando is required.

From this alone it will be perceived what Lussy's teaching is like. What opens these rules to objection is the same which affects all inductive methods: that the rule may be established upon insufficient data; and, again, admitting the correctness of the observation, it may be questioned whether any performance in simple obedience to the rule, as such, can be tolerated—whether, in short, any law-giving is at all possible, since all "expression" is supposed to be the direct outcome of the inward feeling, any obedience to outward prompting resulting only in a stereotyped form of delivery quite opposed to the spontaneity of true natural expression. With respect to the first objection, certainly no rule can obtain in which the exceptions are so obvious as, e.g., to prescribe that all ascending passages are to be accompanied with a crescendo; or where the author has not derived his rule from the study of the music itself, but from some incorrect or slovenly indications of the composer. Lussy has been unwittingly betrayed in this way. He says when we come upon unexpected triplets these are to be accented, and points out a vocal passage by Bellini, where certainly the triplet notes are each marked with an accent; but although there is nothing false about this, there is no obvious reason why all such unexpected triplets demand similar treatment, or even why this passage in itself demanded the same. He has mistaken a composer's arbitrary indication for the necessary expression of the music. Some composers are less careful about their indications than others—despite the tendency of the present time to minutely prescribe every nuance; and many instances there are, especially in operatic music, where the passages being perhaps of a florid kind, written simply with a view to display of the singer's voice, though the signs may not altogether run counter to the meaning, which yet seem to admit, with equal justice to natural truthfulness of expression, of being executed in a variety of ways.

The ambiguity of the word "expression" as employed in these rules will perhaps not have escaped you. It shifts from the simple metrical distinctions to those having emotional significance. The meaning of the word "expression," as employed by Lussy, is, I fear, not a very elevated one. The prime object of the work was to afford a guide for musical learners; and I judge the author (in his capacity as teacher of the pianoforte) would have been sufficiently satisfied of the correctness of the pupil's "expression," had the latter simply followed after the rules laid down in his book. The work is, in short, a codification of the rhythmic, dynamic, and other nuances as they ordinarily exhibit themselves. But it is one thing to make observations of this kind; another to formulate "rules." The natural laws of expression lead to some agreement in the forms; but it is a question whether, reversely, from the close imitation of the form you reproduce the original impulse. It is the way in which such data are utilised that makes all the difference. If a pupil puts a stress in a certain place, because M. Lussy tells him that stresses invariably occur here—admitting the correctness of the observation, the naturalness with which this originally comes about, and the unanimity of all executants in this observance—one need not be a musician to see that the result will be valueless. And even if M. Lussy were to deny that the teaching of his book were such as I have made it appear, he has certainly not sufficiently guarded against this interpretation as to make such objections (which, as I have remarked, have already been raised elsewhere) seem so surprisingly unjust as I admit they did to me at first.

The fact that no hard-and-fast rules are possible does not, of course, affect the value of the data in themselves. We must not do a thing because it has been ascertained that the generality of performers do in this manner; but, nevertheless, to have insured this unanimity on the part of players, there must be some underlying principle; and the solution of the matter would be to show the rules as far as possible in the light of these. How far is it possible to arrive at these underlying principles? It is true Lussy attempts this to some extent; but his explanations are sometimes simple, fanciful illustrations—as, e. g., in connection with his rule that on leaping to a high note and descending through a series of notes we glide to the high note but detach the descending notes; he illustrates this by the reboundings (smaller by degrees as they go on) of an india-rubber ball upon the floor. But, of course, however apt this illustration, it is no explanation of the reason of notes invariably occurring (taking Lussy's observation as correct and holding good in all instances of this kind) in this way. The fact also of a rule, instituted on some faulty theory, being found not to obtain generally, as when ascending passages are found not to be invariably accompanied with a crescendo, or a descending passage with a diminuendo, this rule, founded on some fanciful analogy with actual height and depth and the difficulties attending ascents, might not of necessity cause all explanation to appear hopeless. It might simply be that whenever the same sort of passage appears admitting of opposite manners of rendering, there are counter-ruling principles at work at different times. But not to let it seem that I am occupied throughout in book-criticism, for the present I will dismiss M. Lussy and the "Traité de l'expression musicale."

Spohr's "Last Judgment," will be given at St. John's, Edinburgh, on Saturday Dec. 22nd by the choir, under the direction of the organist, Mr. F. Bates, Mus.Bac., and on Christmas Eve the first part of the "Messiah."

"A. M." can only say that Lord Overstone's name was on the list of the Committee of the Musical Union, and that he probably, attended some of the matinées. Very unlikely that such a musician never "put in an appearance." "A. M." knew the Rev. Mr. Goddard by sight, and his face must have been quite changed if he was the gentleman carried in a chair. Mr. Ella will be referred to to decide the matter of fact. It is never safe to make positive assertions.

The Upton Choral Society gave a concert at the Stratford Town Hall, on Dec. 3rd. The soloists were, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Arthur Thompson; violin, Herr Emil Mahr; conductor, Mr. Joseph Proudman. Accompanists, pianoforte, Mr. F. C. Kitson; harmonium, Mr. G. B. Gilbert. The programme included, "God, Thou art Great!" (Spohr); "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn"), and a miscellaneous selection of sacred and secular music.

Signor Foli.
Selection from the Incidental Music to "The Birds of Aristophanes" ..... Parry.
(First time of performance).
Conductor of this Concert, Mr. C. VILLIERS STANFORD.

"Genoveva" is the title of Schumann's only opera. The story is that of a knight who was compelled to leave his lady-love for the Holy War, and came back to find her apparently unfaithful. Many tragical incidents are bound up in the libretto, and the overture depicts the intense suffering and passion of the unhappy pair. A more interesting story, by the way, was told me when in Germany many years ago, respecting a worthy knight who took part in the so-called "Holy" Wars, and the wonder is that no operatic genius has, as yet, set it to music. Those of your readers who have climbed the far-famed Drachenfels, will remember the little island of Nonnenwerth at its foot, and on the other side of the Rhine the grand old ruins of Rolandseck. Roland was the knight, the island long ago contained a nunnery, which is now turned into an unpicturesque hotel. The story is, that while Roland was away, the news came that he was slain in battle. His faithful lady was so inconsolable that she forthwith discarded the world and took the veil. Of course the news she received was false. Roland came back safe and sound, but the lady, alas! was beyond recovery. Roland's only consolation was in building a castle, from whose tower he could catch sight of her figure as she walked in the nunnery garden. Whether she was at last rescued or no I cannot remember, but the story might be made a very effective one for music. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" was superbly played and greatly enjoyed.

Mdme. Montigny-Rémaury is a great favourite at these concerts, and deservedly; her playing of the C minor concerto was eminently successful. The cadenza, written by Rubinstein, is as may be imagined, no trifling matter, and was executed by her with perfect ease and splendid effect.

Dr. Stanford, who conducted on this occasion—Mr. Manns having gone to Glasgow—favoured us with his own Serenade for orchestra. It was first brought out with success at the last Birmingham Festival, and its merits fully set forth in the Musical Standard. It was much appreciated at the Crystal Palace, the intermezzo especially making a marked impression.

As a rule here, the last number in the programme fares but badly, owing to so many having to leave for particular trains; and on Saturday last comparatively few Londoners could remain to hear Mr. Hubert Parry's graceful incidental music to "The Birds of Aristophanes." It is more simple than most of his other compositions, but it is none the less acceptable on this account. The Entr'acte in F, the gathering of the birds, and the nuptial processional march were the only three numbers performed out of the twenty contained in the Incidental Music, a larger selection from which would have been listened to with pleasure.

Miss Ehrenberg, the lady vocalist, gave much pleasure in Weber's "Araby" and in Mr. G. F. Bennett's new and pretty song "Night and Love," and Signor Foli sang as usual with great effect.

Accompanist - - - - - - Mr. Zerbini.

A comparatively small audience listened to the above programme, a strong argument against the opinion that well-known works are most generally acceptable, for a more familiar selection could scarcely have been made.

The two works for strings were beautifully rendered. Beethoven's light and pleasant serenade trio should have the sub-title of "suite," or it runs the risk of being looked upon as informal (which it is not). It is legitimately one of the few links of that period uniting the old suites of Bach and Handel to the modern writers of suites, among whom Raff stands foremost. Does it strike any listener how the variations in this trio foreshadow those in the septet? The resemblance is most striking in the second variation. Beethoven, with all his affection for the variation form, rarely got beyond the goal aimed at by his predecessors—to deck his subject in a variety of ribbons, laces, and frillings; it was left to a later master, Schumann, to reveal in variation form the higher power alluded to by Goethe, in speaking of another art, of "so awakening our imagination that all we here see concreted shall again become fluid without losing its character." By the way, it is difficult to understand why the short allegro, built upon the theme of the andante should not be considered as another (the 5th) variation instead of being treated in our programmes as an independent movement.

Miss Zimmermann responded to the encore that her solos called forth. In her accompaniment of the favourite Heller-Ernst pieces she was occasionally hard and unsympathetic, but every pianist knows the difficulty of playing the by-no-means unimportant pianist's part of these real little treasures just as it should be played. The numbers chosen were the Lied No. 4, the Intermezzo No. 11, and "Abschied," No. 6.

Miss Thudichum does not appear to me to have made any striking progress in her art since last season, but now, as then, she promises well.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Last Monday evening, the 11th concert, and last but one before Christmas, the programme comprised:—

PART 1.

Sextet in G major (Op. 36), for two violins, two violas, and two violoncellos ..... Brahms.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer, Zerbini, Peiris and Piatti.
Song, "Creation's Hymn" ..... Beethoven.
Miss Hilda Wilson.
Fantasie in F minor (Op. 49), Berceuse (Op. 57), Valse in D flat (Op. 64), for pianoforte alone ..... Chopin.
M. Vladimir de Pachmann.

PART 2.

Adagio in E major, from Concerto in A minor, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment ..... Viotti.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda.
Song, "The golden thread" ..... Gounod.
Miss Hilda Wilson.
Quartet in D minor (Op. 42), for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Haydn.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer and Piatti.
Accompanist - - - - - Mr. Zerbini.

Brahms's first string Sextet, in B flat was performed, and duly noticed at the Saturday afternoon concert of Dec. 1. It will be observed that M. de Pachmann appeared on Monday at 8 o'clock to play the pieces of his favourite composer, after a laborious recital of nearly two hours the same afternoon (elsewhere recorded). Miss Hilda Wilson, a protégé of Mrs. Ellicott, wife of the Bishop of Gloucester, made the vocal numbers notable by choosing good pieces and rendering them well.

M. de Pachmann merely repeated his successes of the afternoon; how he plays these fugitive pieces of Chopin is matter of musical history. The usual recalls ensued; as regards encores, it were to be wished that none were reported, for the sake of the artists themselves; but the "public" would not thereby be cured of their selfishness. The Sestet of Brahms, a work of riper age, was first performed at the instance of Madame Norman-Néruda, in February, 1879, and will never be repeated without satisfaction to the subscribers. The details of the text are very interesting—such as the inner pedal of the leading viola, which serves as a bourdonnement; the collision of the keys E flat and G, the lively style of the scherzo, and the peculiar treatment of the poco adagio in E minor, with its several divisions. The finale, in 9-8 time, starting with a figure of semi-quavers for violin and violoncello only, which leads to a pretty pastoral subject, is full of animation and stirring subjects.

The adagio of Viotti in E was excellently rendered by the fair leader of the strings, and Haydn's quartet, played for the fifth time, is so concise as to leave no excuse for the rushing out, as usual, before the presto finale. The last Monday concert will be followed by one on Saturday, Dec. 22.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann held his first Pianoforte Recital on Monday afternoon. The following is a copy of the programme:—

Sonata in G major, No. 4 ..... Bach.
"Le Carnaval" (Op. 9) in A flat ..... Schumann.
Barcarolle in G major ..... Rubenstein.
Capriccio (Op. 76) No. 1 ..... Brahms.
Nocturne ..... Leideritz.
"Frühlingslied" (Op. 15), and Toccatina (Op. 23) ..... Henselt.
Ballade in G minor (Op. 23), Mazurka (Op. 50) No. 2, and Valse ..... Chopin.
Toccata (Op. 7) ..... Schumann.

This scheme speaks for itself. The Sonata of Philip Emanuel Bach was read with great "objective" exactness; and the Chopin selection, of course, evoked rapturous plaudits. The third Valse was played separately from the rest; the favourite one, in D flat, made its usual mark. The Nocturne of Leideritz (inscribed to M. De Pachmann), is a graceful and elegant effusion, if bearing a family likeness to many pieces du même genre. The Toccatina of Henselt has been heard, this autumn, both at the Popular and the Crystal Palace concerts. The Barcarolle of Rubinstein won a bis, and deserved the honour. M. De Pachmann's version of "Le Carnaval" ought to have satisfied the most exacting, and probably did so; if not quite the same as Rubinstein's, which may be thought unrivalled and unattainable. The second Recital is fixed for Wednesday next, Dec. 19.

A. M.

MR. J. B. BONAWITZ'S "HISTORICAL" PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The fourth and last recital on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 5th, attracted so large an audience at the Bluthner Rooms, that it was found necessary to place carpets on the staircase in order to seat the visitors, for room inside could not be found.

The scheme is as follows:—

Allegro in G minor ..... Scarlatti, 1683—1757.
Gavotte in D minor ..... Bach, 1685—1750.
Fugue in B flat ..... Porpora, 1685—1767.
Fantasia in D minor ..... Mozart, 1756—1791.
Sonata (Op. 3), in C ..... Beethoven, 1770—1827.
Rondo in E flat major ..... Hummel, 1778—1837.
Impromtu No. 4 ..... Schubert, 1797—1828.
Fantasia (Op. 17) and movement ..... Schumann, 1810—1856.
Nocturnes in A and D flat, Mazarka in B flat minor, and Valse in D flat major .... Chopin, 1809—1849.
"Les Huguenots" ("Fantaisie de Concert") Thalberg, 1810—1873.

The works of living composers included:—

"Liebeslieder Walzer" (Duet) ..... Brahms.
Tanz (Op. 106) (Duet) ..... Hiller.
Bilder aus Schiller's, "William Tell" ..... Zapff.
Gavotte ..... Sgambati.
Five Dances (Op. 3), (Duet) ..... Bonawitz.
Galop Chromatique ..... Liszt.

Mr. Bonawitz laboured under indisposition, but played admirably, nevertheless, and the audience applauded vociferously. The numbers that seemed to please the most were Porpora's Fugue, the last Sonata of Beethoven in C minor and major, Schumann's Fantasia, and the Chopin pieces. Mr. Bonawitz played the valse of Chopin (D flat) in octaves, and some of the audience appeared to be taken by surprise. Miss Cecilie Brousil assisted Mr. Bonawitz in the duets.

A. M.

Mr. F. F. Rogers, of Malvern, has, it is announced, completed the setting of his cantata entitled, "Deborah" upon which he has been occupied for some considerable time.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The Guildhall School of Music gave a choral concert at the Mansion House on Dec. 8th, when Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" music, with pianoforte accompaniment, served to manifest the good singing of the choristers, which was afterwards also effectively displayed in several part-songs. The vocal solos in Mendelssohn's work were well rendered by Miss A. Heale, and Messrs. D. Henderson, A. Lister, and S. H. Beckley. The programme comprised various items, from among which may be specified the eleven solo vocal performances of Misses J. Bawtree, M. Hallam, E. Aloof, N. McEwen, and J. Turner; and the violin playing of Miss L. R. Dixon. This City musical institution, under the energetic direction of Mr. Weist Hill, is doing good service. It might have been wished (one critic says) that the capital orchestra associated therewith had co-operated in Saturday's concert.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

Macfarren's "King David" was given by Mr. Willing's choir on Tuesday evening, Dec. 11th, at St. James's Hall. The soloists originally engaged were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Frederick King. Mr. Rigby was, however, suffering from a severe cold, and his place was supplied, at a short notice, by Mr. William Shakespeare, who proved a very efficient substitute. The performance was in every respect a fine one, and the orchestra entitled to special mention. A. S.

MR. FREDERICK PENNA'S CONCERT.

The benefit concert of this well-known and excellent artist took place at the Steinway Hall, on Monday evening, Dec. 10th, in the presence of a numerous and highly appreciative audience.

PROGRAMME.—PART I.

Trio, "Queen of the Night" (Mdme. Catherine Penna, Miss Isabel Chatterton, and Mr. J. D. Perrott)	Smart.
Aria, "It is enough" ("Elijah") (Mr. J. D. Perrott)	Mendelssohn.
Song, "Only a Rose" (Miss Isabel Chatterton)	Boyton Smith.
Violin solo, "Elegie" (Herr Pollitzer)	Ernst.
Song, "Sweet, have the roses" (Mdme. Catherine Penna)	Salaman.
Song, "Queen of the Earth" (Mr. Frederic Penna)	Pinsuti.
Pianoforte solo, "L'Elegante," and "Waltz-Galop" (Signor Tito Mattei)	Mattei.
Song, "Adelaide" (Signor Odoardo Barri)	Beethoven.
Harp solo, "Clouds and Sunshine" (Herr C. Oberthür)	Oberthür.
Melodia, "La Rimembranza" (Signor Ria)	d'Alessio.

PART 2.

Recitation (Dramatic Scene) "Henry VIII." (Mr. Frederic Penna)	Shakespeare.
Song, "Nella calma" (Mdme. Catherine Penna)	Gounod.
Song, "Danza dalla memoria" (Signor Ria)	Caracciolo.
Violin solo, "Légende," "Mazurka" (Herr Pollitzer)	Wieniawski.
Duet, "Maying" (Mdme. Catherine Penna, and Signor O. Barri)	Smith.
Song, "The right way to go" (Mr. Frederic Penna)	Penna.
Duet, "Quando di sangue tinto" (Signor R a, and F. Penna)	Donizetti.

Conductor - - Mr. Wilhelm Ganz.
Accompanist - - Herr Lehmeyer.

It is always a pleasure to have nought to give but unqualified praise, and in this instance such praise can be conscientiously accorded to all concerned. Mr. Penna's recitations were admirable, and the performances of Herr Pollitzer (violin), Herr Oberthür (harp), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), were little short of perfection. Signor Odoardo Barri whose name appears in the programme, failed to put in an appearance. Mr. Penna's lecture on the "Art of Singing" is replete with interest, and worthy of careful perusal by all lovers of music. A. S.

TOTTENHAM.—On December 7th, a concert was given by the Tottenham Musical Society, in the large new Hall in Bruce Grove. The principal vocalists were Mdme. Clara West, Miss Alice Woodruffe, Miss Marian Johnson, Miss L. Lyle, Mr. T. Moncrieff, Mr. S. H. Hagon, and Mr. W. H. Webb. Solo cornet, Mr. J. W. Grieves; solo clarionet, Mr. J. G. Brookes. Band and chorus of 100 performers. Accompanist, Mr. E. A. Crushla; organist, Mr. H. J. Belchambers; conductor, Mr. Fred S. Oram. The audience (which was highly appreciative) numbered at least a thousand persons; and the concert was altogether a distinct success.

The death of Signor Mario is announced as taking place at Rome on Dec. 11th.

WINDSOR.

Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein assisted, on Dec. 8th, at a concert given by the Windsor and Eton Amateur Madrigal Society at St. Mark's School, Windsor, upon the occasion of the presentation of a testimonial to Sir George Elvey. There was a large audience. During the interval between the parts, Princess Christian, in the name of the subscribers, presented Sir G. J. Elvey with a portrait of himself (a capital likeness), painted by Mr. Val Prinsep, A.R.A., a gift which was duly acknowledged by the talented musician. Princess Christian (piano) and Miss Spinner (violin) subsequently played Schumann's "Phantasiestück;" a romance for ladies' voices, "Die Nonne" (Brahms); a song, "Genesung" (R. Franz), very clearly and musically enunciated by Mr. Donaldson, and the part-song, "The larks aloft, the wind blows soft" (Garrett), bringing the entertainment to a close.

HARROW.

The Harrow School Musical Society recently gave a recital of "Cinderella," a fairy opera in four acts, composed by Mr. John Farmer, the well-known musical professor at that school, to words written by the late H. S. Leigh. It was given in the Speech-room of the school, the choir, band, and singers including present and late Harrovians and members of the Royal Academy of Music. Signor Randegger conducted the affair with his usual excellence and sympathy. The great hall was quickly filled in very orderly fashion by the boys of the school, leaving only space for certain musical professors, critics, the masters and their families, and friends. The work, which Mr. Farmer calls a "little opera for big children," or a "big opera for little children," is natural, graceful, and full of rhythmical life, without rhythmical vulgarities, and is sure to be very popular when presented to the public. I hear it is to be performed in Liverpool in January next by the Carl Rosa Company, and subsequently in London. Much of the music of this opera can easily be reproduced on the piano. There are songs in it to suit all voices and all tastes, and delightful dances, too; a minuet and gavotte which are most taking. There is a children's ballet in which the popular "singing quadrilles" written by Mr. Farmer some time ago are reproduced. The nursery rhymes are given most brightly, and will be a great feature of the performance, when scenery and costumes are introduced.

HORNS ASSEMBLY ROOMS.

On Wednesday evening, Dec. 12th, Messrs. R. J. Pitt and G. F. Grover gave their second evening concert at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal artists were Mesdames Vincent and Clark, Misses Bocquet and Kissel, Messrs. Murton, Reynolds, Budd, and Pitt, and Master J. H. Pitt, violinist. Amid much that was excellent, we should fail to do justice to a good concert, if we omitted to draw attention to the very effective and artistic singing of Miss Alice Bocquet, who possesses all the elements of a fine contralto, and to the admirable rendering of Sir H. R. Bishop's "Pretty Mocking Bird," by Mrs. Clark. Mr. Budd in a popular song, met with a very cordial reception. The most interesting feature, however, was the violin playing of Master Pitt, whose accurate tune and time spoke eloquently for his careful training, whilst his fulness of tone and delicacy of expression were remarkable in one so young. Messrs. Pitt and Grover are to be congratulated on the success of their musical work in South London. The arduous labours of Mr. Grover especially, in this direction, are most praiseworthy, and are doubtless destined to bear a good harvest.

THE LONDON TRICYCLE CLUB.

The annual dinner of the above club was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, on Thursday, Dec. 6th, Dr. B. W. Richardson M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., being the chairman. During the evening, a selection of pieces was given by Miss Medora Collins, Miss Lapworth, Dr. Armand Semple, and Dr. Broughton Stirling, with Mr. E. J. Williams as accompanist. The efforts of all were duly appreciated, but the violin performances of Mr. Viotti Collins and Dr. Stirling, and the concertina playing of Miss Medora Collins, were the chief features of the entertainment.

PUDSEY.—The sixth annual concert of the Choral Union Concert was given on December 3, in the Public Room, when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given, with a band and chorus of 120 performers. The Principals were:—Miss Cockroft, Miss Cragg, Mr. Blagbro, and Mr. Jackson; Mr. H. Heap being leader of the band; Mr. P. A. Strickland, A.C.O., organist of the Parish Church, conducted the whole. The audience numbered 600 persons, and included a large portion of the élite of the district. The oratorio, on the whole, was very carefully and creditably given, while certain portions were admirably rendered. Great credit is due to all who took part in the performance for contributing to the very successful result in so difficult a work—a result that evidently took many people by surprise.

LEICESTER.

The first of the second series of Mr. Harvey Löhr's chamber concerts, in this town, was given on Nov. 29th, in the lecture-room of the Museum. The programme comprised selections from the classic school of instrumental music, which were interpreted by a number of musicians of the highest efficiency. With the recollection of what was experienced last year, the attendance was an indication that these intellectual and instructive evenings are increasing in popularity among our music-loving townspeople, and that the enterprise exhibited in their arrangement is being worthily recognised. The lecture-room was filled; and the hearty applause bestowed by an audience—which was nothing if not critical—was sufficient testimony to the general merit of the work. The programme opened with Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, Op. 18 (No. 4), for two violins, viola, and violoncello; the performers being Mr. W. Frye Parker, Mr. W. Easton, Mr. W. V. Waud, and Mr. W. Buels. The same gentlemen also played Haydn's Quartet in G major, Op. 17 (No. 5), which is even more sparkling and melodious than Beethoven's composition, and was listened to with the deepest pleasure throughout. Mr. Harvey Löhr gave a pianoforte selection—Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Op. 31 (No. 1) (Mendelssohn). The selection was well chosen, and the performance was perfect. Mr. W. Frye Parker played Beethoven's Romance in F, Op. 50, for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, which afforded ample opportunity for the display of his great ability as an executant. The tone produced was remarkable for purity. Another treat was the Introduction and Polonaise, in C major, Op. 3, for pianoforte and violoncello (Chopin), by Mr. Harvey Löhr and Mr. Buels. This is one of the most taking and melodious compositions Chopin has left us out of the vast number which he wrote. The vocalist was Miss Ambler, who thus, we believe, formed her first acquaintance with a Leicester audience. She sang with considerable energy and feeling. She undertook no mean task in submitting Liszt's ballad "Loreley," a melody by Gounod, and the German "Der Herrlichste" (Schumann). But in each effort she was very successful, the enunciation being clear, and the music interpreted with due expression and feeling.

BATH.

On Dec. 4th, at the Assembly Rooms, the Bath Choral Union gave its first concert for the season. The losses to Herr Sondermann on past concerts induced some of the members of the Choral Union to make such arrangements as would relieve the conductor of all pecuniary anxieties. A committee was formed, Mr. R. S. Blaine kindly consenting to become president, and subscriptions were invited for three concerts to be given through the season. The result was a very general response. The first part of the concert consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Of course, to give this work with any approach to completeness, a good band was required; and to obtain this, the conductor secured the services of Herr Van Praag as leader, and selected competent performers from Birmingham, Bristol, and Gloucester, to supplement our local musicians. The result was, a band of thirty-eight, with the defects which are almost inseparable from an orchestra so constructed. Solidity and refinement of the highest character can only be obtained by the performers constantly playing together; and it cannot, and should not, be expected that thirty-eight musicians, who occasionally meet, should play with the same amount of evenness and smoothness as those who are always working together. The "reeds" were a little coarse, and the "brass" too powerful. The choral part of the oratorio, generally, was very well done. Mrs. Hutchinson, to whom was entrusted the soprano solos, started a little out of tune, but she soon rectified the difficulty, and gave the music with much taste and devotional feeling. The duet "I waited for the Lord," in which she was joined by Miss Ellen Shackell, of this city, was sweetly sung by both; and so was the duet "My song shall be alway," by Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. E. Lloyd. The second part was of a miscellaneous character. Here Mrs. Hutchinson again distinguished herself, and won a hearty encore for her pleasing singing of "Deh vieni non tardar." Mr. Lloyd was again and again recalled after his fine rendering of "Walther's Preislied," from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." One must give a word of praise to Mr. Brownell for his part in Handel's "Largo;" and also to Miss Mendum for her harp accompaniment. Wagner's "Tannhäuser" march closed an excellent concert.

Thanks to Messrs. Simms and Son, the local public had the opportunity of hearing M. Pachmann at the Assembly Rooms, on Dec. 6th. The programme was well calculated to enable the audience to judge of his style and method of interpretation. It embraced five selections from Chopin, three from Henselt, two from Schumann, and one each from J. S. Bach, Beethoven, Brahms and Rubinstein, all of which were played from memory, and with exquisite finish. The great merit of the artist is his thorough conscientiousness. He loves his art apparently too well to sacrifice it to mere meretricious displays. There was no lack of power, but it was used with discretion; and the result was, that the recital was characterised by rare taste and refinement, which repeated plaudits showed how thoroughly the audience appreciated the music.

MANCHESTER.

Prior to last week I have had nothing worthy of communication to you, the only novelty we have lately had being a visit from Richter—without his orchestra—which has already been noticed in your columns. Last week, however, Mr. Hallé produced for the first time here Rossini's "Mosé," in concert garb. The cast of principals comprised Mesdames Albani, Thudichum, and Hilda Wilson, and Messrs. Lloyd, Kearton, Newth, Hilton, Bridson, and Foli—a goodly roll! In every sense the performance was a great success, and the most unstinted praise is due to Mr. Hallé in regard to it. Although the performance lasted three hours, one almost begrudged the omission of the ballet music, which, I suppose, however, is absolutely necessary for the due appreciation by the English public of an "oratorio." All the principals were excellent, and band and chorus alike good. The printer's devil made one of our local critics say next day that "the little Miss Hilda Wilson was highly satisfactory." She certainly was the latter, but I rather demur to the qualifying adjective. J. H.

LEEDS.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society gave an excellent concert in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 5. The programme included Bach's Magnificat, Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Gade's "Psyche,"—rather too much, it was thought, to get through in one evening. "Psyche" was performed for the first time in Leeds, and was very well received; though it scarcely received full justice, coming as it did at the close of a long programme. The principals were Miss Marian Fenna, Miss F. Sellers, Mdme. Isabel Fassett, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Wood Higgins, and Mr. Oswald; and principals and chorus all did their work in a satisfactory manner. The band was led by Mr. Otto Bernhardt; Mr. James Broughton made a thoroughly efficient conductor; and Mr. Alfred Broughton ably presided at the organ.

On Friday evening, Dec. 7, Spohr's "Last Judgment" was sung at Leeds Parish Church before a large congregation. The choir was increased to 100 voices, including about thirty females. The principals were—Miss E. Norton (soprano), Master Bramham, of Leeds Parish Church choir (contralto), Mr. C. Blagbro (tenor), and Mr. Morton (bass). It would be unfair to criticise a sacred performance of this sort; but special mention must be made of Miss Norton's exquisite rendering of the recitative—"I saw a new heaven and a new earth," also of her share in the duet with Mr. Blagbro, "Forsake me not." The lovely quartets, "Yes, every tear," and "Blest are the Departed," were given with much feeling; while the chorus, "Lord God of Heaven and Earth," as well as the other choral numbers with which the work abounds, were rendered in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The performance as a whole was admirable, and evidently produced a great impression. Dr. Creser gave valuable assistance at the organ. J. D. T.

WORCESTER.

There was a meeting on Dec. 1st at the Guildhall, Worcester, of the stewards of the next Festival of the Three Choirs, the Mayor (Mr. W. B. Williamson) in the chair, when the first steps were taken towards arranging for the Worcester Festival of 1884. Beginning, as at the last Wordester meeting on Sunday, there will be an opening service at the Cathedral, with band and chorus, on Sunday, September 7. Monday (8th) will be devoted to rehearsal, and there will be oratorios on each succeeding morning of the week at the Cathedral, viz., Tuesday, Gounod's "Redemption;" Wednesday, a miscellaneous collection of Masses and Cantatas; Thursday, Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," and Part 2 of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul;" and Friday, Handel's "Messiah." Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given on Wednesday evening, and there will be secular concerts on Tuesday and Thursday evenings; the week's music ending on Friday evening with cathedral music with band and chorus. On the whole, this is a good selection, and it is satisfactory to find Mendelssohn well represented. The large services, with orchestra, are commendable features, and will help on the good work of again putting the divine art in a rightful and exalted position as an ordained expression of praise and worship.

TAUNTON.—It is to be hoped that the Philharmonic concert was as great a success financially as it was musically. Taunton, as well as the Society, has to thank Mr. Dudeney, the conductor, for the treat of December 6th; because, though we often enjoy selections from the "Messiah," this is the first time for many years that Handel's grandest oratorio has been performed in toto in Taunton. The soprano parts, taken by Miss Florence Rowe, were admirably rendered. The contralto parts were well given by Mdme. Rose Bailey, and her solos, "Oh, Thou that tellest," and "He was despised," were much appreciated. Mr. W. Clinch's voice and style were excellent. Mr. Edwin Welsh's knowledge of the music, and firmness of tone, was very marked in the recitative "Thus saith the Lord," and also in the air "Why do the nations rage." Altogether, the Society may well be congratulated on the success of this their last concert of the season.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Such a remarkable occurrence as the production in our town of two new English compositions, viz., Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," and Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda," which have been performed by the Carl Rosa Opera Company at the Tyne Theatre, has created quite a stir among all who have faith in native talents and hopes of a National Opera in England. Never before have the visits here of this talented company excited such enthusiasm as the present series of representations called forth, for every space of the splendid Tyne Opera House has been nightly crowded to excess—in fact, many persons were unable to gain admittance.

The present season opened on Nov. 26th with Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia," when we had the good fortune of hearing the Parisian prima donna, Mdme. Marie Roze, as the heroine, a rôle in which this charming singer displayed not only great histrionic power, but also a marvellous vocalization. Miss M. Burton as Orsini, and Mr. Ludwig as the Duke, and Mr. B. Davies as Gennaro, were also successful in their parts.

The first performance on November 27th of Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda," was such a decided success that it had (by desire) to be produced again on Saturday, Dec. 1st, when it drew an equally large and enthusiastic audience as at the first representation. The principal parts were artistically sustained by Mdme. Georgina Burns (Esmeralda), Miss C. Perry (Fleur-de-Lys), Mr. B. McGuckin (Phœbus), Mr. L. Crotty and Mr. Ludwig (Quasimodo and Frollo), Mr. Snazelle (Clopin), and Mr. B. Davies (Gringoire). The chorus did their work well and the band played satisfactorily under the skilful conductorship of Mr. Goorsen. Mdme. Burns's magnificent singing of the brilliant air, "Oh, fickle, light-hearted swallow," in the first act, and the beautiful quintet with chorus in the second act, were enthusiastically encored. The same compliment was paid to Mr. McGuckin for his rendering of "O vision entrancing," and to Mr. Crotty for his fine singing of "What would I do for my queen." "Esmeralda" is a clever and pretty opera, containing much bright and pleasing music, which, if not always strictly original, is skilful and well scored for the orchestra. Unlike the music of Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," which appeals more to the thoughtful listener and the educated musician, the melodious music in "Esmeralda" accords more with the present taste of an ordinary English audience. It seems that people have yet to learn to submit to a little training before they can appreciate an English opera based upon the Wagner theories, like "Colomba." That such, at least, was the case in Newcastle, cannot be denied. The first performance of "Colomba" on Friday, Nov. 30th, did not succeed in creating a very favourable impression upon the vast audience assembled. It is to be regretted, for in no other English opera performed here has so much true, ingenious, and fine workmanship been displayed as in Mackenzie's "Colomba." Notwithstanding, the parts were well sustained by Mdme. Marie Roze, Miss Perry, Miss Annie Albu, and Mr. McGuckin, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. H. Pope, and Mr. Snazelle. All the performers, including the chorus and the orchestra, seemed more or less over-weighted by the music—the latter were also inadequate in tonal power and quality to give a fair hearing of the work. The beautiful ballad, "So he thought of his Love" (with its strong flavour of a popular Scandinavian Folk-song), won the only encore; it was sung most effectively by Miss Perry.

On Wednesday evening, "Carmen," a favourite here, was excellently performed by the artists engaged. Mdme. Marie Roze—a fascinating Carmen—was repeatedly recalled, and bouquets were freely thrown down after the fall of the curtain. Miss Annie Albu (Michael) evoked much applause for her fine singing in the third act. Mr. Crotty (Escamillo) sang magnificently, and Mr. B. Davies made his mark as José. The band and chorus played and sang admirably.

Balfe's popular opera, "The Bohemian Girl," did not attract quite so large an audience on Thursday as the others had done, nor was it put on the stage in the best form. One reason was because at the last moment Mr. Pope had to be substituted for Mr. Crotty (who was suffering from hoarseness) in the character of Count Arnheim. Mr. W. Mockridge (Thaddeus), was encored in the song "When other lips," Miss Annie Albu (Arline) received well deserved applause, and Mr. Snazelle (Devilshoof), as usual, excited great hilarity by his comic fun.

The operas have been splendidly mounted, and the acoustic properties of the large Tyne Opera House proved to be most satisfactory; in fact Mr. Younge, the manager of this popular theatre, may be congratulated on the success he has achieved in every way.

H. W.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh visited the Royal College of Music on Dec. 1st during the weekly ensemble class, and listened to portions of the Quartets in D by Haydn, and of Mozart in E flat. The class was conducted by Mr. Henry Holmes, professor of the violin, and the following students performed:—Sutcliffe, Bent, McCunn, Squire, Miss Holiday, Dolmetch, Kreuz, and Werge.

BRIDPORT.

The members of the Bridport Choral Society opened their winter concert season at the Drill Hall under very encouraging circumstances. It was the first concert of the season, and although the programme was of a somewhat different character to that which is usually presented, it was of a varied and pleasing description. There was a satisfactory attendance, the reserved seats being nearly all occupied, whilst the other seats were fairly filled. Mr. Hopkins, the conductor, and the promoters of the concert, were fortunate in securing the services as vocalists of Miss F. M. Gill, of Blandford, who has previously appeared before a Bridport audience under the auspices of this society, and of Mr. W. Clinch, from Wells Cathedral. The first part of the programme consisted of a pastoral cantata by Louis N. Parker, A.R.A.M., called "Silvia," in which the scene was laid on the borders of a wood, and the characters represented being these:—Silvia (Miss Gill), Sybil (Mrs. J. T. Stephens), the Poet (Mr. Clinch), the Huntsman (Mr. Hopkins), and a chorus. The cantata was one of the most pleasing productions which the society has placed before the public since its resuscitation, and the audience evidently appreciated it. The music is very taking and was sustained in such an efficient manner that there was no lack of interest. The accompaniments were played in a careful manner by Mrs. Benham (pianoforte), and Miss Champ (harmonium). The heartiest applause greeted the conclusion of cantata, which lasted for about an hour and a half, during the whole of which time the interest and pleasure of the audience was well maintained. The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection.

GREENOOK.

The members of the Greenock Philosophical Society were entertained, on Nov. 30th, by a musical lecture, given by Mr. W. Spark, Mus. Doc., of Leeds. The vocalists were—Madame Pauline Evison, Miss Emmeline Kennedy, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. T. Dodds, and their individual and combined efforts proved them to be worthy of the flattering reception accorded by a numerous and critical audience. The subject of Dr. Spark's lecture was, "Bach to Gounod, or Music, Ancient and Modern." In his opening remarks he said, it was his privilege that evening to draw their attention to the works of some of the great musical composers—the great thinkers and workers of the divine art. The Doctor dwelt upon the eminent musicians of the past 150 years, their difference of style, form, and effect, their greatness of originality; and intimated that in drawing up his programme he had not chosen the most elaborate or effective of musical compositions, but simply such as were brief, yet which were strikingly characteristic as possible. The lecture and illustrations were of a most enjoyable nature, both from a literary and musical point of view. Dr. Spark handled his subject effectively, dwelling upon the history, the development of the talents, the peculiarities of the genius, and the characteristics of the great creators of living music; and an occasional dash of humour seasoned the intellectual repast.

BRIXTON.—An excellent concert was given by Miss Mary Mackway at the Brixton Hall, on Thursday evening, the 6th inst. Miss Mackway was assisted by a numerous array of vocalists and instrumentalists. The following were amongst the most successful items in the programme:—"With verdure clad," very artistically sung by the bénéficiare; "Ave Maria," composed by Walter Mackway, and sung by Mdme. Worrell, with violoncello obbligato by Mr. W. Hann; this was vociferously encored and repeated; "When the Moon is brightly shining" (Molique), Mr. Arthur Thompson; and the "Toreador's Song" ("Carmen"), Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Mention should also be made of the two MS. songs—"Peacefully slumber," by C. S. Macpherson; and "The Rainy Day," by W. Mackway; both being sound compositions above the ordinary type of song. Mr. W. Hann and Mr. Mackway respectively contributed violoncello and pianoforte solos; and Messrs. A. Izard, Kiver, Macpherson, and Mr. Frederick Walker conducted.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—The members of the St. Paul's Institute Choral Society gave the opening concert for the season, in the large hall of St. Paul's Institute on a recent evening, when there was a very fair attendance. The programme opened with the overture from "Samson" (Handel), very efficiently performed by the band, assisted by Mr. Geo. Barnes at the organ. This was followed by the eight-part motet, "Judge me, O God," (Mendelssohn), sung by the chorus. The chief feature of the evening was the performance of Stainer's cantata "S. Mary Magdalen," in which the chorus was assisted by Miss Blanthorne, Miss Emily Harris, Mr. R. Clarke, and Mr. Geo. Harris. The chorus may be fairly congratulated (together with the conductor, Mr. A. B. Plant, F.C.O., Mus. Bac.) for the efficient manner in which they interpreted the music. The rapid transitions from one key to another make it a work of no small difficulty, but they proved themselves fully adequate to the task, and did credit to themselves and their leader. Mr. Plant conducted and Mr. Geo. Barnes efficiently presided at the organ. The society will put in practice Gounod's "Redemption," it is said.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

PARIS, Nov. 30th, 1883.

The great and overshadowing musical event of the month has been, of course, the re-opening of the Theâtre-Italien. When the Salle Ventadour, after passing from one unlucky management to another, was finally closed and converted into a bank, it was generally thought that we had seen the last of Italian opera in Paris,—no one certainly expected that it would be resuscitated in our generation. The sudden taste for Wagner, and jealousy of all rivals of the native composers who were following in the footsteps of the German prophet, combined, or seemed to combine to make the public indifferent to the light and stereotyped art of Bellini, Donizetti, and their contemporaries, which ten years earlier had delighted it. The critics, headed by M. Jouciéres, joyfully sung a requiem over the Italians, and a golden age seem opening for all the ambitious "Prix de Rome," who had so long been clamouring for an opportunity of producing their masterpieces. And yet here we find Italian Opera, or at all events an Italian Opera house, not only open again in Paris, but so fashionable that it bids fair to prove a serious danger to MM. Vaucorbeil and Carvalho. How is a fact so singular to be explained?

Well, the most natural explanation is perhaps afforded by the presence of the many strangers and foreigners in Paris. It is tolerably safe to say that there is a population of at least ten thousand wealthy foreigners here, hungry for amusement and glad to have a rendezvous in which to display their charms and riches. The Opera House, that is, the opera-house of M. Vaucorbeil, only very partially satisfies their requirements, for it is the rendezvous of French fashion, and contains but a limited number of seats. The Conservatoire is still more inaccessible. The Cirque is vulgar. It is not astonishing, therefore, that when M. Maurel announced his intention of reviving the Ventadour as the Theâtre des Nations, his idea was welcomed with enthusiasm.

There is another reason, too, for his success. M. Vaucorbeil cannot, or will not, give his subscribers the variety that he had fallaciously promised them when he was angling for the post of M. Halanzier. The "Huguenots," and "Faust," and "Sylvia," and "L'Africaine," will pall upon the most patient ear, if they are given month after month, and week after week; and especially if given with inferior casts. Lastly, M. Maurel was clever enough to include French composers in his programme. He will not perform Italian Opera exclusively, but will find room in his scheme for German and French Opera, also in Italian.

The work chosen for the inauguration-night was Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra," sung by Maurel, Ed. de Reszké, Nouvelli, and by Mms. Fides-Devriés, who, after a long and more regretted absence from the Paris stage, has issued from her retirement and returned to the boards. After being the "Star" of the French Opéra House, she bids fair to be a still more brilliant "Star" as an interpreter of the Italian répertoire.

"Simon Boccanegra" is not, as is constantly asserted, a youthful composition of the maëstro. It was written after "Il Trovatore," and "Rigoletto," and belongs to the transitional period which preceded the composition of "Don Carlos," "La Forza del Destino," and "Aida." As you are aware, Verdi lately re-wrote portions of the work; but despite this, or possibly to some extent on account of this, it is very inferior to his best operas, and lacks interest. The orchestration is either commonplace or pretentious—often both; the melodic inspiration is imperfectly sustained; and the form is undecided. There is an unpleasant savour in parts of the libretto, too, and the story told is neither very clear nor very fascinating. Yet so fine was the interpretation that, in a sense, "Simon Boccanegra" may be said to have succeeded. That it will have a long life in Paris I do not believe, but it will fill the house en attendant the production of "Erodiade" and "Mefistofele."

The Concerts are as well-attended as ever this year. M. Lamoureux seems to be rapidly gaining the public favour, and the Theâtre du Chateau d'Eau is now more crowded than the Cirque every Sunday. Amongst the novelties which are to be given by M. Lamoureux this season is a performance of Bach's little known work "Le Dêé de Phœbus et de Pan,"—which has not yet been heard in Paris. En attendant, he has treated us to two magnificent executions of "The Italian" Symphony. M. Lamoureux gives quite a new reading of the work, taking the tempi throughout much faster than customary here, and yet managing to bring out a number of delicate lights and shades which, too often, are slurred over and not understood.

M. Colonne holds his ground at the Châtelet. For Sunday we are promised Meyerbeer's "Struensee" music, Félicien David's "Désert," and some fragments of Saint-Saëns's "Henri VIII."

On the same day M. Pasdeloup will give us Beethoven's Symphonie en la, an Andante and Rondo by Chaussier, Peter Benoit's "Ouverture de Charlotte Corday," Haydn's "Serenade"; a Concerto of Mozart, and Massenet's "Fête Bohême."

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1883.

THE PROPORTIONATE STRENGTH OF BAND AND CHORUS.

AT the recent performance of BERLIOZ's "Requiem" Mass at the Crystal Palace, the admirable effect of a small chorus of really reliable, because trained and responsible artists, opened up in a practical fashion the consideration of the topic forming the title of this article. We are justly proud of our hosts of amateur chorus singers, and all musicians gratefully recognise the good work they have done and are still doing for the Art. Yet there are compositions requiring a choral performance of a character it is unreasonable to expect from non-professional singers, and it is artistically unjust to the composers of such works to assign the choral department to amateur singers. I am here using the word amateur as distinguishing non-paid and to some extent irresponsible and not strictly trained performers. The very nature of some elaborately orchestrated scores demands a choral strength which is not unwieldy, but which is sharp and prompt in attack, courageous, vigorous, instantaneously under control at all times, passionate and nervous in utterance, and consisting of well picked voices carefully balanced, and built up of such reasonable numbers as will secure an incisive and well concentrated vocal army. Chosen troops and not straggling hosts of inert, ill-prepared irregulars are wanted for the elucidation of the scores of BERLIOZ and other modern writers. It is high time to consider the questions bearing upon vocal and instrumental tone balance. Eminent musicians have long set their faces against monster choruses swamping with their sluggish, indecisive harmonies all the sharply-cut outlines, and delicate effects of modern elaborate instrumentation. A distinguished foreign musician hearing once a performance of "Elijah" at the Albert Hall under such conditions, left the room after the earlier portion of the oratorio, with the remark that he had no pleasure in a performance in which the texture of the orchestration was so outrageously submerged by an overwhelming, yet indefinite chorus. Sir MICHAEL COSTA is said to have estimated the balance of tone suitable for the Albert Hall as only to be justly realised by a band of 500, with a chorus also of 500. One may not be inclined altogether to endorse this dictum, for monster bands are usually as inartistic in their performances, however imposing in array, as are monster choruses. Still, only to think of a chorus, to count from 300, 400, or 500, up to 800 with a band of about 80, performing works of a modern type with a dominant orchestration, is, if one may make such a comparison, to picture a feast with a bill of fare nearly limited to bread and potatoes. Without in any way checking or interfering with the work of our numerous amateur choruses, it is now time at a period of earnest musical culture to take steps with regard to the better balancing of our vocal and instrumental forces; and if not for frequent employment, we ought for special occasions to build up some select, thoroughly trained, earnest, and responsible professional choruses. The time is past for chorus singers who at the best read music indifferently, who consequently lack fire and certainty, and who sing merely for the pleasure of singing, to be identified with exciting public occasions, or to get free tickets for themselves and their friends. Art must, to be sound and true, be practised upon a basis of undeniable earnestness, and served by artists nurtured by careful technical preparation. When we come to hear modern choral works performed by such artists, whether professional or amateur, balanced in about the proportion of 70 instruments to 100 singers, then we shall really begin to know what perfect music may be like. A good basis of proportion may be obtained by a comparison of the mass of strings employed with the number of chorus singers engaged, accepting the wind instruments and percussion as at a fixed standard. Thus, if the strings number 50 (with complete phalanx of wind in addition) the chorus, of really picked singers, should number about 100, or represent twice the strength of the combined strings.

Digitized by Google

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

XVI.

THERE are, it is true, no special rules for the conduct of counterpoint in more than four parts, seeing that the enlarged score not only necessitates the relaxation of the leading laws affecting contrapuntal activity, but by the preservation of a thickened tone texture releases both composer and listener from obligations naturally more stringent in the clearly to be traced outlines of more limited scores. Still there are points upon which the student may be advised with advantage concerning the writing of counterpoint in more than four parts. In order to obtain moving power in handling parts lying close together, as is the case in counterpoint having 6 or more parts in action, the student may, with decided gain, take some preliminary practice in the conduct of counterpoint of all species in three high, in three low, then in four high and in four low parts. Such practice in writing for, say, separate choirs of female and male voices, will tend to secure a clear vision in laying out closely fitting harmonic stream, and will consequently help to give readiness of resource and speed in writing for a large score. Then, in the actual practice of counterpoint in 6 or more parts, it is well, in order to avoid massing the parts too much together, and producing stiffness in the texture of the harmony, to adopt in a general sense the following suggestions:—Do not permit, save exceptionally, more than three voices in six parts, or more than four in seven or eight parts, to move in the same direction at the same time; and when the three or four parts do move in the same direction, as must constantly be the case in large contrapuntal scores, endeavour to break up the mass of voices proceeding thus, by intermingling layers of parts moving in opposite directions; so that, for example, if even four parts move at once in a given course, the voices thus proceeding shall not be those nearest to each other, but shall be mixed up with intervening voices having a different kind of movement.

At the New Town Hall, Westminster, Mr. S. V. Balfour's concert was given on Dec. 3rd, 1883. The vocalists were Miss Elise Worth, Miss Florence Rachelle, Miss Alice Kean, Signor Odoardo Barri, and Mr. F. G. Caldicott. Instrumentalists: solo pianoforte, Herr Georg Asch; solo flute and piccolo, Miss Cora Cardigan; Solo piccolo, Mr. O. Booth. There was an orchestra of 40 performers. The programme included, overture, "Bronze Horse" (Auber); descriptive fantasia, "Smithy in the Wood" (T. Michaelis), encored; descriptive march, "La Caravanne" (George Asch), conducted by the composer and encored; overture, "Poet and Peasant" (Suppé); pizzicato, "Mandolina" (for string instruments) (O. Langey); and gavotte "Mignon" (A. Thomas).

At the West End Eisteddfod, held at the Town Hall Westminster, under the presidency of Sir Watkin Williams on Dec. 4th, some good solo singing was to be heard in the musical competitions, though defective voice production was the chief complaint to be made in most cases. Two of the choirs in the choral competition sang "But as for His people" (Handel), with such evenly balanced excellences, that the adjudicator (Mr. E. H. Turpin) divided the prize between the two choirs; a decision which was received by a crowded and enthusiastic audience with such loud applause as betokened general approval.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The thirteenth annual meeting was held on Nov. 22nd ("St. Cecilia's Day"), in the music class room. There were present —Sir Herbert Oakeley, President of the Society; Vice-Presidents—Sir Alexander Grant, Professors Flint, Butcher, Rutherford, and Muirhead; Dr. Woodhead, Dr. Sydney Marsden, Mr. G. Gordon, Mr. Small, and others.

The chair was taken, as usual, by Professor Sir HERBERT OAKELEY, President, who said:—"Sir Alexander, Professors, and Members of our Musical Society,—In welcoming the Society here for the thirteenth year since its re-organisation, my first duty is to explain to novices the main objects of this annual meeting, which are, to hear the Chairman and Honorary Treasurer's reports, to elect office-bearers for the session, and to re-animate members—or embers which, after the brilliant success of last March, must still remain aglow, and which, let us hope, will be fanned into flame during a year in which the occurrence of the Tercentenary will draw increased attention to this University, and will attract here many savants in science and art. These illustrious guests will require, amongst other festal greetings, some serenading by our Choral Society. To new-comers here, some reference to the aim and history of that excellent institution, which I hope they are about to join, seems necessary, and although older members may find such details wearisome, it cannot do them harm to be once a year reminded of regulations, responsibilities, privileges, and achievements. Of the latter, echoes have been heard in other lands, and our example here has been successfully followed by students of the other universities of Scotland."

"As to responsibilities, the chief one is regularity in coming here once a week to practise. And in the way of privileges—well, they are so great and so many that if I attempted to enumerate half of them we should be here a long time. In respect to shortcomings, too, or rather hindrances, I might give a tolerably long recital, but it is pleasanter to recite some achievements, and to touch on some salient points in our history. The first public hint towards the formation in Scotland of such an association as ours seems to have been dropped in an inaugural address delivered in this class-room in 1866, in which it was said, in allusion to the practical working of this Chair,—'Premising that all attempts as regards a difficult question must necessarily be experimental. . . . I think that a choral class might be formed. When I was an undergraduate at Oxford, an association existed among the students under the title of the "University Amateur Musical Society," and enabled us to give, with professional instrumental help, terminal concerts; . . . it would afford opportunity of introducing excellent glees and choruses for men's voices.' And the germ of our Society may be traced to a concert given, a few months after that address, by the Committee of the Athletic Club, which was announced simply as 'University Amateur Concert, in which the performers will consist chiefly of members of the University.' In 1873 the good work effected by the Association was recognised by Royalty, in my receiving the assent of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh to become our Patron. And as such patronage is carefully and exceptionally granted, the favour should be duly appreciated. By this time our concerts had become popular in Edinburgh, and heard of abroad. The best known German musical paper, Die Signale, published at Leipzic, at once the biblical and musical centre of Germany, gave a favourable mention of our programme of 1874—a fact worth recording.

"Each year I affirm that our last concert was our best." But, as I tell you the truth, it is a matter of much congratulation, that in the face of difficulties which, I may safely say, are experienced by no other musical society existing, we should be able, year by year, to keep up the gradual crescendo which commenced so pianissimo some seventeen years ago. There is no doubt that the performance of the chorus last March was better than any previously attained. Not very many years ago it was seldom indeed that so rare a male bird as an amateur male instrumentalist was to be seen, or rather heard, in these latitudes, and his appearance was not a wholly welcome phenomenon, being sometimes supposed to have something supernatural or uncanny about it. In these more enlightened and less superstitious days the apparition is so frequent as to be divested of any mystery or peculiarity. The proportion of men among the audience at a concert is about 20 to 1 to what it was twenty years ago; and as to amateur male performers on some instrument, or those who can take part in a chorus or part-song, the increase is about as great. Indeed, among students of this University not only has some insight into choral music been attained, but recently some promising attempts have been made towards the formation of an amateur orchestra, which I hear of with great satisfaction, and wish the movement every possible success. Here, however, the difficulties are far greater than those of forming an amateur student chorus. Every one has a voice of some sort, and a great authority on vocal music asserts that any one can learn to sing, but to play even tolerably well on an instrument requires far more and far earlier study and practice than to take a part in choral music. An excellent musician, in giving some hints to amateur violinists, closes with two practical remarks:—(1) 'Do not take up the violin unless you mean to work hard at it.' (2) 'It is almost hopeless to attempt to master the violin after the age of ten.' The whole family of stringed instruments require long and arduous study, and some of the wind instruments, such as the oboe or horn, are scarcely ever successfully manipulated by amateurs. In fact, the musical training and artistic competency necessary for orchestral players are generally much underrated, especially if high class compositions are attempted.

"Assuring students instrumentally inclined of all sympathy, I now return to the affairs of our Choral Society.

"As it grows older, its work and its influence bear fruit, and its name and its doings are wafted far away by its many members who travel or who settle in foreign lands."

Mr. JAMES H. MACDONALD, addressing the meeting, said that he had passed last winter at Leipzig, and had been enrolled a member of the "Paulus Männerchor Verein," which was founded by Mendelssohn, with a view to form a bond of union with his Conservatorium (Music School) and the University, and had become the most efficient and famed student-chorus in Germany. Professor Langer, director of this Society, on hearing that he (Mr. Macdonald) hailed from Edinburgh University, inquired with much interest about our Choral Society, saying that he knew the President by repute, and would propose to send him from the "Paulus Verein" a sympathetic and friendly greeting, in the shape of the Mütze, or cap worn by that Society as a badge of membership. This proposal having been seconded by the Leipzig students, Mr. Macdonald was commissioned to present the blue Mütze, and in doing so at this meeting explained that it was hoped that when any of our members were in Germany and saw wearers of this cap it would be remembered that it was a bond of union and of friendly intercourse between the two Societies. The cap having been presented amidst applause, Sir Herbert Oakeley expressed his thanks and that of his Society for the honour thus paid, assuring Mr. Macdonald that "the cap would be carefully preserved and placed in view for members, that a German letter should be sent to Professor Langer, expressing appreciation of the gift; and that he hoped that members might recognise the 'blue bonnet' when at Leipzig, and that in all cases the cap might fit."

Mr. JOHN SMALL, honorary treasurer, read the financial statement for the past year. Total income resulting from accumulated subscriptions or donations, and from concert receipts, £387 11s., and expenditure, £185 19s. 1d., leaving a balance in hand of £201 11s. 11d.

Principal Sir ALEXANDER GRANT moved the adoption of the report and the financial statement. In the course of his remarks he congratulated the Society on its continued prosperity and advance in choral singing, and on the President's interesting account of the Society, to which he had listened with much pleasure. At the Tercentenary celebration the University would be anxious to exhibit all its treasures and resources to the strangers and illustrious foreigners who might come to visit them on that occasion, and he was sure they should have great pride and pleasure in bringing forward the Choral Society, because it was a Society which would do the University honour and credit.

Professor FLINT moved the election of the office-bearers for year, including H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh as Patron; Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, ex officio President and Conductor.

Dr. R. SYDNEY MARSDEN intimated that at the last meeting of the committee, last session, a sum of £40 was placed in the hands of the committee to commemorate in some way, in connection with their Musical Society, the Tercentenary of the University. The result of their deliberations was a resolution to purchase a bust of their President, Sir Herbert Oakeley, which would be presented to the University, and placed in the class-room.

Professor RUTHERFORD, rising in response to repeated cheers, said that the lateness of the hour forbade more than a few words of congratulation on the condition of the Society.

Sir HERBERT OAKELEY, after expressing his thanks to Dr. Marsden for the very kind proposal to which he had alluded, and which would receive more adequate acknowledgment later, requested a vote of thanks to the Principal and Professors who had honoured the meeting with their presence, thereby shewing that no fears were entertained on their part that severer studies could be interfered with by the practice of choral music.

The members of the St. George's Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, gave their usual monthly concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 7th inst. The programme was miscellaneous, and included songs by Miss Clara Denison, Miss Clara Myers, Miss Louise Augarde, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Thurley Beale; also several part-songs, amongst which were "Here in cool grot and mossy cell" (Mornington), "'Tis silent eve" (Watson), "You stole my love" (W. Macfarren), "The Soldier's Chorus" from "Faust" (Gounod), etc. Pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Denison, Miss Matilda Crimp, and Mr. F. R. Kinkee, the latter also supplying the pianoforte accompaniments.

On Dec. 5th Mr. E. H. Turpin gave an organ recital at the Congregational Chapel, Maldon. Mr. A. L. Fryer gave much pleasure by his artistic singing; his rendering of Gounod's "There is a green hill faraway" being repeated by desire.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

True to the liberal policy of the committee, the engagement of Mr. Henry R. Rose at the recital on Dec. 8th, added another artist of eminence to the list of those who appeared at the famous recitals. Mr. Rose's talents and skill were already widely recognised; so his marked success was a gratifying result looked for by many far in advance. His opening piece was Sir R. P. Stewart's fine Fantasia in D minor, one of the most notable and effective organ pieces written in these days. A Trio for two claviers and pedal by Bach. and a Fugue on Bach's name by Schumann, came next and were received with loud applause. An Andante Grazioso by Smart, and Guilmant's Funeral March and Chant Séraphique, finely played and admirably registered for, received an encore and was in part repeated. Bennett's "Barcarolle" as excellently arranged by Dr. Steggall, and "O ruddier" (Handel) neatly played on the pedals found much applause. Morandi's E minor Overture was the last organ piece. The organist made a decided impression by his manifest talents and skill, and the committee are to be congratulated upon his introduction to a Bow audience. Miss Clara Samuell sang very charmingly, being encored in two songs and recalled for another. After Sullivan's "My dearest heart," she returned and sang "Robin Adair," and Cowen's "Spinning" was similarly followed by the "Little Maid of Arcadel." Mr. Fountain Meen ably accompanied. On the 10th Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given without the Symphony by a small band of some fourteen players, the organ (Mr. Alfred Carder), and the choir of the institute. The vocal soloists were Miss Larkcom, Messrs. Sidney Town and Brereton. Mr. McNaught conducted with his usual success. The choir admirably sustained the high credit already secured. Haydn's "Spring" formed the second part of the concert.

To-night Dr. Bridge will play an interesting programme, including Handel's Concerto No. 2, set 1, and No. 9, set 2. The accompaniments will be rendered by a body of instrumentalists, conducted by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, mostly members of the Highbury Philharmonic Society. So excellent a programme with such artists promises a marked success.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. A. J. Eyre's performances on Saturday, December 1st, included the following :—

Postlude in D	Smart.
Adagio from a Quartet	Spohr.
Short Prelude and Fugue in E minor	Bach.

Final Chorus, "The Holy City"	Gaul.
Double Chorus, "The Horse and his Rider"	Handel.
Andante, "Evening Prayer"	Smart.
Air, "Love in her eyes sits playing" ("Acis")	Handel.
Allegretto from Symphony No. 4 ("Lobgesang")	Mendelssohn.
Bourrée and Variations in B minor	Bach.
Chorus, "The Seed of David ("King David")	Maclarren.

PERTH, N.B.

Mr. R. Woodthorpe Browne gave the fifth monthly organ recital in Kinnoul Church, on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of the following :—

Marcia di Processionel	Morandi.
Adagio Cantabile	Haydn.
Prelude and Fugue in C minor	Bach.
Andante (varied)	Westbrook.
Sonata in B flat, No. 4	Mendelssohn.
Two Sketches, Andante con moto in F sharp minor, and Canzonet	Chipp.
Concert Fantasia	Stewart.

MOSSLEY HILL.

An organ recital was given in the Church of St. Matthew and St. James, Mossley Hill, on Saturday, December 1st, by Mr. Martin Schneider. The following was the programme :—

ST. MICHAEL'S, FOLKESTONE.

On Tuesday evening last the Rev. E. Husband, Incumbent, gave the last organ recital on the present instrument, the organ being unsuitable in shape for the new organ gallery now being built at this church. The music is always a special feature at St. Michael's, and a "Cathedral" Service is performed daily. The music is "Anglican" throughout, and on Sundays is executed by a choir of about 50 voices, and on week days by a choir of about 30 boys. A peculiarity about this Church is, that Mr. Husband is his own organist, and on this account the key-board has been placed beside the Vicar's stall. The present organ has been in use about nine years, and of this instrument Mr. Husband has himself given 85 recitals. The new organ is being built by Messrs. Jones and Sons, and, it is hoped, will be in its place in the course of the next few weeks. The Church is at the present time being enlarged at a cost of about £7,000, and the great east window has just been filled with painted glass. When completed, St. Michael's will be one of the most imposing churches in Kent.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.

An organ recital was given on Thursday, December 6th, in the Presbyterian Church of England, Cross Street, by Mr. A. B. Plant, Mus.Bac., Oxon., F.C.O., assisted (vocally) by Miss Georgina Wragge, and Mr. W. B. Dunbar. The following was the programme :—

Toccata and Fuga	Bach.
Air, "Holsworthy Church Bells"	Wesley.
Allegretto in F	Plant.
Chorale Song and Fugue	Wesley.
Andante	Batiste.
Allegretto in B minor	Guilmant.
Adagio, from Sextet	Beethoven.
Rondo	Morandi.
"Occasional" Overture	Handel.

CASTLE HOWARD.

An organ recital was given on Sunday the 2nd ult., in the private chapel, Castle Howard, by the organist, Mr. J. R. Brooke. The following was the programme :—

Overture, "Messiah"	Handel.
Kyrie Eleison, and Gloria, from 12th Mass	Mozart.
Weihnacht's Pastorale (Op. 56)	Merkel.
Marche Heroique in D (Op. 27)	Schubert.
"Qui Tollis" from 12th Mass	Mozart.
Offertoire in C	Wely.
Air, "Return, O God of hosts" ("Samson")	Handel.
"Dona nobis pacem"	Mozart.

SEAFORD.

An organ recital was given in St. Leonard's Church, on Sunday, December 2nd, by Mr. A. H. Day. The following was the programme :—

Organ Concerto, No. 2	Handel.
"Ave Maria"	Cherubini.
"Coronation March"	Meyerbeer.
Air, "Total Eclipse"	Handel.
Prelude and Fugue	Hesse.
Pastorale	Zipoli.
"Zubel" Overture	Weber.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.

An organ recital was given by Dr. Spark, in the New Connection Chapel, on Monday, December 3rd. The following was the programme :—

Concerto in G minor	Handel.
Andante in A flat	Spark.
Two Andantes, "Angelic Voices"	Batiste.
Coronation March, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer.
Motet, "Splendente Te Deus"	Mozart.
Air, varied, in G major	Haydn.
Selections from "Eli"	Costa.

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES.

An organ recital was given at All Saints' Church on Thursday, December 6th, by Mr. W. J. Lancaster, A.C.O. The following was the programme :—

"The night is departing" ("Hymn of Praise")	Mendelssohn.
Fugue in B minor	Bach.
Andante in G major	Smart.
Grand Chœur	Guilmant.
Maidensong	Reinecke.
Air from "Rosamunde"	Schubert.
Andante in A flat	Guilmant.
Marche Religieuse	Gounod.
Organ Sonata, Pastorale in G	Rheinberger.

The second of a series of organ recitals upon the new instrument, by Brindley and Foster, at St. Andrew's, Watford, was given on Dec. 11th by Mr. E. H. Turpin.

EDINBURGH.

An organ recital was given in St. John's Episcopal Church, on Monday, December 3rd, by Mr. Frank Bates, Mus.Bac. The following was the programme :—

Overture, "The Last Judgment"	Spohr.
Grazioso "Evening Prayer"	Smart.
Fantasia in E minor	Merkel.
Prelude and Fugue in G	Mendelssohn.
"Processional March"	Morandi.
"If with all your hearts" ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn.
Prelude and Fugue in G major	Bach.
Cantilene, "Grand Chœur"	Salomé.

LEEDS.

A recital on the grand organ was given in the Town Hall, on Tuesday, November 27th, by Dr. Spark, organist to the Corporation. The following was the programme :—

Festival March, "Eboracum"	Spark.
Romanza in C minor	Bennett.
The Dead March in "Saul"	Handel.
("In Memoriam," Samuel Croft, Esq., J.P.)
Air, "Angels, ever bright and fair"	Handel.
Theme in A major	Haydn.

"Variations Varices"	Gounod.
XVIIIme Siècle	Tavan.
Theme in F major	Bach.
Grand Toccata in F major
Selection from "Carmen"	Bizet.

And on Saturday, December 8th :—

Andante in C major, from the 2nd Symphony, "The Surprise"	Haydn.
Gavotte in D major	Bach.
Andante Espressivo in A flat	Spark.
Allegro Brillante in F	"
Two Andantes, "Angelic Voices"	Batiste.

OXFORD.

Mr. T. W. Dodds, the organist of Queen's, gave a recital on the chapel organ, on Thursday, November 29th. There was a good attendance, and the programme, which included a Sonata, from Bach, in E major, for violin and organ, the former being taken by Mr. V. Garnett Smith, was listened to with interest.

WICK.

An organ recital was given in the Parish Church, on November 22th, by Mr. A. S. Round, A.C.O. The following was the programme :—

Sonata No 1	Mendelssohn.
Barcarolle from 4th Concerto	Bennett.
Andante in G	Batiste.
"Elegy" in B flat minor	Silas.
Musette	Turpin.
Chorus, "Fixed in His Everlasting Seat"	Handel.
"Schiller" March	Meyerbeer.

KEIGHLEY, YORKSHIRE.

On November 17th, an organ recital was given in the Wesleyan Chapel, New Road Side, Keighley, by Mr. J. H. Rooks, organist of St. Paul's, Manningham, and late private organist to the Earl of Zetland. The organ has been presented by Mr. H. I. Butterfield, of Cliffe Castle, and should have been opened a few months since, but unfortunately the builders were unable to have it finished on the date fixed. The chapel was filled by an appreciative audience. The programme was of a high-class character, including selections from J. S. Bach, Guilmant, Mozart, Widor, Batiste, and Sir M. Costa. Mr. Rooks played in his usual masterly manner. The vocal movements were taken from Sir Michael Costa's "Eli," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Handel's "Messiah," and were sustained by Miss Cockroft, of Allerton, and Mr. W. H. Emsley, of Bradford, in a very pleasant and satisfactory way.

GREENOCK.

An organ recital was given by Dr. Spark, of Leeds, at the Episcopal Church of St. John's on November 29th, when the programme included :—

Andante Expressivo in A flat	Spark.
Allegro Brilliante in F major	"
Extemporaneous Introduction and Grand Fugue on Tune "St. Ann's"	Bach.

The music gave much satisfaction to the congregation assembled.

At a special service on Nov. 30th (St. Andrew's Day), a new organ was opened at Holy Trinity Church, West Brighton. The organ was opened by Mr. J. Crapps, F.C.O., the organist of St. Andrew's Church, Waterloo Street, who played the Introductory Voluntary, and accompanied the whole of the service in his usual faultless style. An organ recital was commenced after service; the varied programme selected by Mr. Crapps, fully developed the power, sweetness, and quality of tone of the instrument. Smart's Andante in F was played with great taste and neatness. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor was well performed. The remaining items were also well and effectively played. The organ stands in the chapel on the north side of the chancel and is built by Messrs. Harper Bros., Brighton, at their factory in King-street, and is said to be the largest organ that has yet been constructed in the town. It consists of two complete manuals, CC to G, 56 Notes, and independent Pedal organ, CCC to F, 30 Notes, pedals concave and parallel. Recitals will be given upon this instrument on the Sunday evenings in Advent (after the usual service) by well-known organists.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Bach's B minor Mass was performed at Frankfort-on-Maine on Nov. 26th.

Gobatti is engaged, it is said, upon the composition of a new opera, "Janko."

Dominique Rubini, of Russia, vocal teacher, died lately at Reuil, aged 77.

Manrizio Borella, a bass singer of note, died at Milan last week, aged 64.

The first performance of Suppé's "Voyage en Afrique," conducted by the composer, was very successful in Hanover.

Herr Josef Gung'l is in the best of health living in Cassel at the house of his daughter, Frau Naumann-Gung'l. It is his nephew, Johann Gung'l, who is dead.

It is said that Arrieta's new opera, "San Franco de Sena," will presently be performed at the Teatro San Carlo, Lisbon.

The members of the Riedel Verein, Leipsig, recently gave a performance of Kiel's oratorio, "Christus," in the musically historical St. Thomas's Church.

It is announced by the Gazetta Teatrale, Rome, that Arrigo Boito is writing the words and music of a new opera, to be entitled "Pier Luigi Farnese."

The report is that Signor Lucilla has withdrawn his new opera, "Il Conte Rosso," from the Teatro Regio, Turin, and it will be produced at the Teatro Carlo Felice, Genoa.

The Wagnerian opera series began in Vienna on Nov. 30th. All the composer's works are to be given with the exception of "Parsifal," of which Bayreuth keeps the monopoly.

Herr Gramman's new opera, "Das Andreasfest," produced with success a short time since at the Stadttheater, Augsburg, is now accepted for performance at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna.

Another English pianist has appeared on the musical stage. Miss Maggie Okey, once a student of the Royal Academy of Music and now under the tuition of M. de Pachmann, has played with a measure of success as a pianist at Vienna.

It is said of the performances at Bayreuth next year, that King Ludwig of Bavaria will guarantee all the expenses, and ten performances of "Parsifal," with the Munich performers will take place between July 20th and August 8th. Afterwards some performances will be given of the "Nibelung's Ring."

The management of the Stadttheater, Leipzig, produce next March a new opera, "Heliantus," by Adalbert von Goldschmidt, composer of the oratorio, "Die sieben Todsünden." Several notable musicians, including Franz Liszt, it is said, speak highly of the new work, and prognosticate for it a marked success.

Passing Events.

Sir A. Sullivan contributes a Christmas carol to this month's Lute, it is said.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert on Dec. 13th, at St. Andrew's Hall.

The new opera on the subject of "Marie Stuart" by Sir Arthur Sullivan, is in progress, and the first act was completed recently.

It is, we hear, not improbable that a daughter of the eminent tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, will shortly make her début on the stage.

Mr. C. E. Stephens's duet sonata for flute and pianoforte will be played to-night (Saturday) at a concert of the British Artists' Society.

A new operetta by Mr. A. J. Caldicott "A Moss Rose Rent," will be produced at Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment on Dec. 17th.

Mdlle. Nevada, or rather Miss Wixom, late of Her Majesty's, and now of the Paris Opéra Comique, has been secured for the Norwich Festival next year.

"The Quack Composer" is the title of No. 10 of "Musical Sketches" in the Musical World, by H. E. D. The article is severely just and very timely.

M. Audran's comic opera "Gillette" was withdrawn on Saturday night, and Miss Kate Santley has, it is understood, relinquished the direction of the theatre.

It is announced that a cantata on the subject of "Hero and Leander," by Mr. Harford Lloyd, has been accepted for performance at the Worcester Festival of next year.

The committee of the "Earl of Wilton" Memorial to be placed in St. Margaret's Church, Holyrood, Prestwich, near Manchester, have decided upon a stained glass window, to be executed by the firm of Ward and Hughes, of Soho, London.

One sign of the return of the oratorio to its true home, the church, is the increased seasonable use of given appropriate works; thus "Spohr's Last Judgment" has been frequently given in church already during the present Advent.

Mr. Nelson Varley, a well known tenor and protégé of M. Lemmens, died at Cardiff on Dec. 1st. For the last four years he has been a chorister in Mr. D'Oyly Carte's provincial troupes, joining the "Iolanthe" company some ten weeks ago.

The College of Preceptors, holding important examinations including music as a subject, are about to build a large college in a central position. It is said the candidates entered for the Christmas examination number a good many over 8000.

A special service will be held in Canterbury Cathedral at 8.15, on Christmas Eve, when the Christmas music in the "Messiah" will be sung with band and auxiliary choir of ladies and gentlemen. Dr. Longhurst will conduct, and Mr. Maxted will play the organ.

At the next members' meeting of the Central Music Studio, Herbert Street, N., on Dec. 20th, the principal (Mr. W. J. Bailey), will give a lecture—"Stephen Heller; his Life and Works." Admission free by ticket, which may be had upon application to the secretary.

Mr. von Zastrow has begun his Drawing Room concerts at the Glendower Mansions, South Kensington; and due notice will be taken of them next week. His pianist and violinist, Mr. Bond Andrews and Herr Polonaski, are both fine artists. An aristocratic assembly attended the first séance on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 1st.

Mdme. Montigny-Rémaury's pianoforte recital on Monday afternoon agreeably entertained a select audience; but a report must be reserved till next week. The scheme was slightly varied, and sundry "extras" were played by the fair Parisian, who is to visit Glasgow and other towns in the north before her return to Paris.

The Costa testimonial has, is is said, been given up. Although it may be right to duly recognize artistic merits and labour, there is truth in the pointed words of a contemporary that with the heavy burden of our poor at our doors, this is not the time to be making large money offerings to foreign musicians who have already been handsomely dealt with.

Miss Florence St. John has, it is said, been retained to "create" the part of "Nell Gwynne" in M. Planquette's forthcoming opera, which, however, will not be produced at the Avenue till after Jan. 15th, or late.

The centennial of the birthday of the celebrated painter Peter von Cornelius was celebrated by the Academy of Arts, Berlin, on Dec. 11th. The proceedings opened with a performance of Beethoven's festival overture, followed by a commemoration address, delivered by Dr. Jordan, director of the National Galleries, and closed with Mendelssohn's Cornelius march.

Admirers of one of the greatest, if not the the greatest of song composers, will be glad to read that Herr Friedländer, of Frankfort, is preparing a complete and critical edition of Schubert's "Lieder," to be published by Peters of Leipzig. It is said that the numerous errors of previous editions will here be carefully eliminated. The work is to have a preface by Herr Max Müller.

Miss E. Madeline Kelley gave an evening concert at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on Dec. 11th, and was assisted by the following artists—Mrs. Irene Ware, Mdme. Szilardka Dumtsa, and Miss Amy Carter; Mr. John Probert, Mr. Benjamin Nickels, jun., and Mr. J. Clifford Mill. Solo violoncello, Mr. J. A. Brousil; pianoforte, Mdme. Harry Brett.

Mr. Barnby, conductor of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society gave a capital performance of "Elijah" on Wednesday night, with Mdme. Albani as his principal soprano; and Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as her coadjutors. Mdme. Albani sang deliciously. The audience attempted to encore several pieces, but the conductor was inflexible. More details next week.

The analytical programme of a pianoforte recital given by the Rev. J. H. Davis, in aid of the fund for supplying a hydraulic engine for the organ at West Derby Church, Liverpool, where Mr. Best is the organist, affords the local paper the Porcupine, an occasion for the humorous dissection of a remarkable specimen of its kind. Analytical programmes need not be written when the writer has not the justifiable technical and historical knowledge.

Mr. Banner's Liverpool Choir, which, since leaving St. Cuthbert's Church, have been actively engaged in the rehearsal of Spohr's "Last Judgment," produced that impressive work on Wednesday, 5th inst., at Mr. Banner's house, with organ and pianoforte accompaniment. On Wednesday next they are announced to sing the same oratorio in St. Bridget's Church, Wavertree, near Liverpool, when they will be supported by a body of string instruments. The wind parts will be arranged for organ from the full score. Mr. J. W. Collinson will be leader, and Mr. S. Claude Ridley, who has trained the choir, will conduct.

The first stage rehearsal of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's new opera founded upon Mr. Tennyson's "Princess," took place at the Savoy Theatre last Monday. The leading part of the Princess Ida will be played by Miss Lilian Russell, the young American mezzo-soprano. The King Gama will be Mr. George Grossmith, while Mr. Rutland Barrington will represent King Hildebrand. Mr. Bracy, the tenor—a new comer—Mr. Lely, and Mr. Riley play the Three Princes, and Mr. Temple one of the Princess's sturdy brothers. The other performers are Mr. Warwick Grey, Miss Brandram, Miss Jessie Bond, and Miss Leonora Braham. The opera is in a prologue and two acts—a departure from the usual form of the author and composer.

The Querist.

Queries.

Music.—I have an Amateur Orchestral Society. Many of the members are very fair players of their respective instruments, but, living in the Provinces, I am at a loss to get suitable music for them. Would any of your readers kindly give me a list of some good music, or tell me the best publishers to apply to for catalogues, &c.?—D.C.M.

Sacred Part Songs.—Will any of your numerous readers kindly inform me if there any good sacred part-songs to be obtained, after the style of Sullivan's "Say, watchman, what of the night"?—An Old Subscriber.

THE LATE SIGNOR MARIO.

Giuseppe Mario Marchese di Candia, who died at Rome after a short illness on Tuesday evening, December 11th, was born according to some accounts at Turin in 1808 or 1810, and to other accounts at Genoa in 1812 or 1814, but according to his own account at Cagliari in 1810. His father was a general in the Piedmontese army and afterwards governor of Nice. The young Italian commenced his military career by joining the Sardinian Chasseurs de la Garde, then garrisoned at Genoa, and having been detained at Cagliari on suspicion of some political intrigue he resigned his commission; but upon his resignation being refused, he escaped and made his way to Paris in 1836. As a youth he had studied music at the Turin Royal Academy, and his success as an amateur had been superb, but at this stage of events being offered an engagement by M. Daponchel, then manager of the Paris Opéra at 1,500 francs a month, he determined to try his fortune as a dramatic singer. He therefore underwent a course of study with Professor Bordogni for singing, and Ponchard for French pronunciation. He then assumed the nom de théâtre of Mario. He appeared first in 1838 as Rambaldo in Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," and although his refinement of manner, elegant appearance, and charm of voice were conspicuous qualities, yet with these were associated little or no stage experience, a certain nonchalance, and a total absence of dramatic power, and his French pronunciation was marked by his native Italian accent.

Théophile Gautier describes his voice as a genuine tenor of considerable extent, reaching to the B and C of the chest, attacking the notes freely and holding them well; his passages from one register to another were executed with facility, only that at points where power is required the high chest notes became deficient in fulness and slightly guttural. Mario soon realised the fact that he was not in his proper element in French opera; and therefore he joined the company of the Théâtre des Italiens, in which he at once made his mark in the midst of a magnificent assemblage of singers, including Tamburini, Lablache, Malibran, Sontag, Persiani, and Grisi. He made his début at this theatre as Nemorino in Donizetti's "L'Elisire D'Amore," in which opera he was supported by Persiani as Adina, Tamburini as Belcore, and Lablache as Dottore Dulcamara. In London he appeared for the first time in 1840 as Gennaro in Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia," and it is written of him that his acting did not at that time go beyond that of a Southern man with a strong feeling for the stage.

From 1840 onwards for many years Mario sang alternately at the Théâtre des Italiens at Paris and Her Majesty's Theatre in London, forming after the retirement of Rubini and Sontag, a member of that celebrated quartet which consisted of himself, Grisi, Tamburini, and Lablache, and for which Donizetti expressly wrote the "Don Pasquale." It is worthy of note that his first success was made in 1842 at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, where he sang with Grisi and Lablache; the latter was at the time co-director with Tamburini of the Théâtre des Italiens at Paris. Rubini was making most extravagant demands for the renewal of his engagement, and after Mario's first night in Dublin, Lablache despatched a special messenger to Paris authorising Tamburini to refuse Rubini's extortionate terms, as a tenor had been found to take his place. He remained at Her Majesty's Theatre until 1846, at which period occurred the rupture with Mr. Lumley and the secession from his management, to which circumstance the Royal Italian Opera owes its establishment. At the last mentioned house Mario resumed the dramatic parts or those of the grand opera, and it was here that his dramatic genius developed itself, instances of which may be remembered in the Raoul of "Gli Ugonotti," and the Giovanni di Leyden, of "Il Profeta" of Meyerbeer. Fernando in Donizetti's "La Favorita" was another of his splendid creations.

In 1848 he sang in the "Stabat Mater" in company with Grisi and Alboni, and his rendering of the "Cujus Animam" must be green in the memory of many opera-goers.

In the season of 1850 the minor part of Rambaldo in "Roberto il Diavolo" was invested by him with unwonted importance; and although associated with an unparalleled cast, namely, Tamberlik as Roberto, Grisi as Alice, Castellan as Isabella, and Formes as Bertramo, it is said that his part was the gem of the opera.

In 1851 the rôle of "Don Giovanni" transposed for him into a higher key proved a comparative failure.

During the opera season he occasionally appeared at concerts, and he has been heard in English ballads, as "Good-bye, sweetheart," and "I strive to forget thee." He also sang the tenor solos in the "Elijah" at the Birmingham (1849) and Hereford (1855) Festivals.

As an actor Mario was always the accomplished gentleman, his Almaviva, even when acting the roysterer, being never vulgar. At first the great tenor was merely a young nobleman with a "vox et præterea nihil," but he possessed to the full a capacity for taking pains, which as Carlyle has said is the "essential element of genius"; his bearing was gallant, his presence handsome, his voice exquisite and under the most perfect control, his mezza-voce delightful, and he was possessed of a fine artistic instinct. On the stage he was always picturesque; whether as the peasant Nemorino, the fisherman Masaniello, or the gorgeously apparelled prophet-king, he delighted the artistic eye. He undoubtedly excelled in certain characters, such as Faust, Raoul, Fernando, and Romeo. His voice could hardly be called a tenore robusto, but rather a tenore con grazia of the quality termed argentine, having extreme power of modulation and with sufficient vigour upon emergency; but its greatest charm consisted in delicate passages, of which the "Ah! dillo ancor tu m'ami," of the grand duet in the "Huguenots," with its beautiful ascent to the high C flat is a typical instance. He was clearly the best opera-lover ever seen. His articulation was most distinct, his phrasing full of meaning, and the beauty and smoothness of his melodies unsurpassed. He represented to the present generation the traditions of an historic era in the development of the lyric stage, and he was the sole survivor of a group of artists probably never to be approached in excellence.

During the time Mario occupied the operatic boards he stood alone. Great singers of the other sex have appeared in succession: Grisi, Jenny Lind, Viardot, Bosio, Piccolomini, Lucca, Patti, Titiens, Nilsson; but no tenor with the single exception of Giuglini (who was far behind him as an actor), in the union of dramatic and lyrical qualities, could claim to be his rival.

His association with the famous prima donna, Giulia Grisi, had unquestionably a direct and potent influence in the development of his dramatic powers. Courteous, affable, good-natured, and generous to a fault, he was beloved by all, from the humblest employé at the theatre to those of the highest rank. The public not only recognised in him the artist, they went still further, and delighted to call themselves his friends, and numbers who never shook his hand or exchanged with him a single word, have received the news of his death with more than a passing sorrow.

His name and reputation will remain in the history of the opera for all time.

Mario retired from the stage on July 19th, 1871, choosing the character of Fernando for his farewell representation. Inspired by the occasion, he recovered much of his old fire, and his impersonation was manly and pathetic in the highest degree. At the end of 1871 the Marchese di Candia went to Rome, accepting the curatorship of a museum, a post congenial to his tastes since he delighted in pictures and all artistic work, and his last years were occupied in philological and archæological pursuits.

Although it has been stated that during his career Mario must have received large sums of money, yet from his lordly ways and extreme generosity he left the stage in comparatively straitened circumstances. Two subscriptions were raised for him since his retirement, and a concert was given for his benefit at St. James's Hall, in May, 1878, in which Nilsson, Trebelli, and Santley took part, and which proved a brilliant success.

The house in which this celebrated artist breathed his last was in the Via Ripetta, having in its front a terrace hung with flowers and overlooking the Tiber. He was buried on Dec. 13th, and it is stated that his remains will be eventually laid in the ancestral vault at Cagliari. His funeral was attended by Signor Mancini, the Marchese di Villamarina, Prince Odescalchi, the President of the Artists' Club, and numerous other notabilities. Mr. W. G. Cusins, Master of the Music to the Queen, was also present as Her Majesty's representative, and in her name placed a wreath of flowers upon the coffin, upon which among a number of other wreaths was one from the English visitors at Rome.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3	Beethoven.

Conductor - - - AUGUST MANNS.

All musicians know how infinitely indebted we stand to "Papa" Haydn for changing the monotonous contrapuntal style of orchestral music into what is called the melodic thematic, pursuing one thought or theme through all the shades and intricacies of which it is susceptible, and causing it to represent every possible alternation of feeling. "Secondary subjects" are also derived from it, and unity of design and constant variety are exchanged for pedagogic display and pedantic ostentation. The above symphony, though numbered second, was really the first of the Salomon set, and was performed in London on March 11th, 1791, conducted by Haydn himself. Although the orchestra has been greatly developed since his day, there is still a charm about his writings which makes them as welcome as the flowers of May, and Mr. Manns does well in reminding us that dramatic music can occasionally be dispensed with.

Dupont was educated at the Conservatoire at Liège—the birthplace of Grétry—and is now professor of the pianoforte at Brussels. His concerto in F minor is a remarkably clever work, and made a favourable impression, but the themes are overcrowded and individual development to any extent becomes impossible. The orchestra, as is usual with the new school, is the most important part and the piano is at times heard bravely struggling against a gorgeous mist of dramatic effect. The slow movement is an exception. Here the horns and the pianoforte are heard discoursing in a very lovely manner. It is a work that should not be passed over with a few words only, but a second hearing is necessary before giving a decided opinion upon it, and judging by the hearty applause that followed each movement, another opportunity will probably be afforded of treating it more in detail. Too much praise cannot be given to Mdme. Frickenhaus for the part she took in it.

Mr. J. F. Barnett's two sketches are very descriptive of the "Ebbing Tide" and "Elfland." Mr. Barnett sometimes makes excursions beyond his own province, as he did a short time since in "finishing" Schubert's barely sketched symphony, but on this occasion he has had the good sense to undertake a much easier task, and the hand of the master is clearly visible even in these unpretending pieces. The second was re-demanded.

Miss Thudichum was heard to great advantage in Weber's air, and Herr Ritter was especially good in the "Erl King."

Beethoven's grand overture "Leonore No. 3," fittingly closed the Saturday concerts for 1883. The connaisseurs who waited to the end for this, were amply rewarded. The next concert of this series will not take place till Saturday, Feb. 16th, 1884.

R. S.

Another contributor writes:—

I must speak in guarded and qualified terms of the new pianoforte concerto. "Extension," the usual fault of the modern school, is certainly to be noticed in this case. The first movement, an adagio in D flat, struck me as weak, vague, rambling, and rather dreary, although well "laid out" for the pianoforte and the orchestral score. The finale, brisk and rhythmical, affords amplest scope for energetic execution on the part of the soloist, but it is after all but a series of national dance tunes. All the three movements are in common time. M. Dupont is a Belgian of mature age, 55 years. His interpreter, an Englishwonan, well known at the "Popular concerts," played with great power and decision of purpose. I did not wait for the solo—no favourite of mine—in F sharp minor. The beautiful air from "Die Walküre," not very effectively rendered, made no apparent impression upon the common herd of auditors, to whom it was probably caviare. The gallery was rather thinly occupied; only two critics sat near me, and one of these soon disappeared. The second "sketch" of Mr. J. F. Barnett won an encore. Haydn's symphony was a great treat to musicians of catholic mind who still think that order is "heaven's first law," however warmly they may admire the erratic excursions of fiery geniuses that move in orbits of very eccentric ellipse.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Quartet in C major (Op. 59), No. 3, for two violins, viola, and violoncello	Beethoven.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus and Piatti.
Air, "Adelaida"	Beethoven.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Novellette in E major (Op. 21), No. 7, Novellette in A major (Op. 21), No. 6, and Traumeswirren, for pianoforte alone	Schumann.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann.
Follia, for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment	Piatti.
Signor Piatti.
Air, "When the orb of day" ("Euryanthe")..	Weber.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Trio in B flat (Op. 99), for pianoforte, violin and violoncello.....	Schubert.
Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mdme. Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Signor Romili.

When the first part of the opening Allegro in the above Quartet had about half run its course at last week's concert, things came to a sudden standstill, owing to the breaking of a string on Herr Straus's instrument. Some considerable time elapsed before the artist reappeared, having repaired the mischief. The allegro was then begun again from the beginning, the introduction being omitted; and this time all went well.

Signor Piatti's invaluable services are so thoroughly recognised, that when he comes forward as soloist the audience never fails to express its gratitude by loading him with honour. His "Follia"—a re-arrangement of an air by Geminiani—was introduced at a recent Monday concert. As an encore, he played a delightful arrangement of one of Mendelssohn's (posthumous) "Songs without Words," with great tenderness and expression. Signor Romili, who was for the first time accompanist at a Saturday concert, though he is not a stranger to the Monday audience, showed much tact in his accompaniment of the "Lied." If not quite an ideal accompanist, he is at least thoroughly at home in his seat at the piano, and has both discretion and animation to recommend him.

Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "Adelaida," gave universal satisfaction. The last verse of the sweet, purely-melodious song from "Euryanthe," was repeated, as an encore.

Miss Zimmermann played the two novelletes with both intellectual and physical grasp of her subject: the "Phantasiestück (Traumes-wirren)," was not so well suited to her style and capabilties; one missed the exquisite lightness of touch, giving an airy nothingness to the "dream," the slight, scarcely perceptible ritenuto at the eighth bar, and other points that Mdme. Schumann has taught us to look for and appreciate in this graceful and spontaneous little composition.

Schubert's noble trio was interpreted in an entirely satisfactory manner. May we be allowed a hearing of its companion in E flat before the season is over.

B. F. Wyatt-Smith.

THE MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

The 30th performance of new compositions by the Musical Artists' Society, took place last Saturday evening (Dec. 15th), at Aberdeen House, Argyll Street.

Programme.

Miss Kate Heath.

Quintet (MS.), in E flat, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello, with vocal quartet ..... Gilbert.
Mr. Alfred Gilbert, Herr J. Rosenthal, Mr. E. Halfpenny, Mr. W. H. Hann, and Mr. Edmund Woolhouse.
Vocalists: Miss Josephine Pulham, Miss Eames, Mr. Henry Brine, and Mr. Stanley Smith.

Sacred Cantata, "By the Waters of Babylon" ..... Cole.

Conductor - - - - Mr. J. PARRY COLE.

The first work on the list, a string quartet in C, by "F. Adler" (alias Mrs. Swinburne) has the usual fault of essayists at this difficult style of composition, namely, want of concentration, and incoherence in the development of themes. A vocal scena, "Medea in Corinto," by Mr. George Gear, sung by Miss E. Ruthven, is a very effective piece; the orchestral accompaniment has been "arranged" for the pianoforte. A pianoforte quintet by Mr. Alfred Gilbert was omitted, for reasons unknown to the writer. Mr. J. Parry Cole's sacred cantata, "By the Waters of Babylon," pleased some connoisseurs, but struck others as a réchauffé of old ideas, already "used up." The cantata includes solos, quartets, choruses, and double choruses. The vocalists were Misses J. Pulham, K. Brooks, and Eames, Mrs. Susanna Cole, Messrs. E. Levetus, H. Brine, Lansmere, and Stanley Smith. A select band of strings and pianoforte accompanied the vocal score. Mr. Parry Cole conducted.

The signal success of the soirée was achieved by Mr. Charles E. Stephens, treasurer of the Philharmonic Society, who introduced a new "Sonata Piacevole" for flute and pianoforte, in F major. Mr. H. W. Carte, anxious to display the qualities and capabilities of the modern flute, which (as he shows) has changed in a short time from a very imperfect, to a perfect orchestral wind instrument, invites several eminent composers to write flute sonatas, and Mr. C. E. Stephens comes forward the first. This sonata comprises three movements, an allegro grazioso in F; a Romanza (andante con moto) in B flat, and a molto vivo (alla Tarantella) in F. The sonata is sprightly, melodious, and strictly orthodox in form, with the specialité of introducing in the finale repetitions of the first theme of the opening movement. The rhythm of this subject is slightly changed when repeated, and thus the composer verges on "metamorphosis of theme." The Romance in B flat is exquisitely melodious and graceful. The whole work, bright and genial as the composer's own soul—always "dreaming of happiness"—has the pleasantly exhilarating effects of an excursion through charming and picturesque country on a slightly breezy day. The performance was perfect. Mr. Stephens played the pianoforte part with animation and brilliancy, whilst Mr. Oluf Svendsen fully sustained his well-earned reputation. In the last movement occur most ingenious combinations of the first and second subjects; also of the "Tarantella" theme with the first subject of the opening movement.

Another contributor, of high authority, eulogises Mr. Stephens's sonata as "an enjoyable, elegiac, refined and scholarly work, well written for the wood-wind instrument, and giving it as much to do as the thing is capable of." The writer adds that the sonata was "charmingly played."

Hector Berlioz, in his invaluable book on orchestration, defends the flute from the charge of an alleged inferiority as regards its power of expression; admitting, of course, its impotence to equal the "artless gaiety" of the hautboy or the "noble tenderness" of the clarionet. Berlioz boldly asserts that the flute has an unrivalled aptitude for rendering certain sentiments, as, for example, in an air written to express the accent of devotion, modified by humility and resignation. He cites a movement in D minor from the "Elysian Fields" scena in Gluck's "Orfeo," where the hautboy would have been too puerile, the corno inglese too low, and the clarionet rather too powerful. The flute, in Gluck's score, moves (in D minor) mainly above the lines, and holds high A natural; the range is from A to F in alt. Beautiful examples of two flutes playing in the medium register successions of thirds in A flat or in E flat can be found in the operas "Œdipus" and the "Vestale." Gluck, and also Weber, have shown what may be done with the low sounds of the flute. Thus, in Agatha's scena from "Der Freischütz" two flutes move in thirds from low D to A, when the girl is contemplating the beauty of the night.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann.

Part II.

Song, "Noel" ..... Gounod.
Mr. Santley.
Violin obbligato, Mdme. Norman-Néruda.

Trio in C minor, Op. 9, No. 3, for violin, viola, and violoncello ..... Beethoven.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Signor Romilo.

Schubert's quartet, first played by Joachim in 1859, has long served as a stock piece, and requires no further notice, beyond a bow of respectful recognition. Mdme. Norman-Néruda was at her best and afterwards signalized herself in the obbligato accompaniment to Gounod's very appropriate song. The fourth trio of Beethoven for strings, thought to be his best, detained most of the audience. Harmonists, controversially disposed or not, may notice the use, at the very outset, of a chord of the 6-5 on the subdominant (F minor), the root whereof has given rise to some dry discussions. The "added" sixth on the subdominant in the major mode, has been considered a derived discord of the seventh, with a minor third to the root; as, in C major, the root of F (the subdominant) would be D, and the seventh, C natural. In this, the minor mode, not only is the third minor, but the fifth imperfect. How Beethoven shocked the pedants and perruques of his day by opening the sonata in E flat, Op. 31, with a 6-5 on the major sub-dominant (A flat) may be remembered with a sardonic smile.

M. de Pachmann excited a furore in the solo sonata, one of Schumann's early "period," and by no means a superior specimen of his genius. The prevalence of the minor mode (nearly all movements were minor last Monday) increases the pervading gloom of the work. The second theme of the first presto (rasch) movement, and the episode in the finale (both in B flat major), are as gleams of sunshine that break out between dark nimbus clouds. In the slow getragen (andantino) theme, delicious was the humouring of the cantabile by the exponent, who produced the most delicate pianos, and, in particular passages, made each separate note, so to speak, tell its own little tale without detriment to the integral idea. A recall ensued, which ended in an encore. M. De Pachmann hereupon chose a peculiar piece, unknown to many of the connoisseurs present in force. This is a "study" in G by the once famous composer and pianist Ignace Moscheles, an effective piece of music, as music, and supplying good work for both hands, inasmuch as strength and decision are required with the left, and a velvet gossamer touch with the right, for proper execution of the light fairy runs in the upper register of the instrument. The double notes were marvellously executed. A second storm of applause sounded like a demand of the "insatiables" for another piece. Mr. Santley won a bis for "Ich grolle nicht."

On Monday, January 7th, 1884, the concerts will be resumed, when Mdme. Frickenhaus is to play Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, and conduct Schumann's pianoforte Quartet in E flat.

MADAME MONTIGNY-REMAURY'S RECITAL.

Madame Montigny-Rémaury's Recital, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Wednesday, Dec. 12th, drew a select audience. The scheme (subjoined) was not strictly adhered to, as the lady suffered from slight indisposition :—

Programme.
Sonata (Op. 31)	Beethoven.
Sarabande	Bach.
Pièce en Sol	Scarlatti.
Novellette	Schumann.
Preludes, Mazurka and Valse	Chopin.
Passacaille	Thomé.
Romance	Rubinstein.
Impromptu Valse	Liszt.
Serenade et Minuet de Don Juan	Thalberg.

Rubinstein and other great pianists are not wont, strictly, to specify their numbers; and Madame Montigny-Rémaury allowed her publisher to print "Sonate, Op. 31," as if only one Sonata were intended under that title, whereas there are three. As anticipated, the Sonata in D minor proved to be the selection, and, admirably was it read throughout, with power and emphasis, grace, finesse, and nicest observance of nuances, such as the subscribers to the Musical Union were long accustomed to note. The "Preludes" of Chopin, and the "Valse," were well chosen, and charmingly played. Thalberg's piece was omitted; but no person of taste would go into mourning on that account;—or for Liszt either. Madame Montigny-Rémaury interpolated the "Lied Ohne Worte" of Mendelssohn in A minor, called the "Volks Lied;" and the pretty "Gavotte" in A, from "Mignon." Many of the auditors, ignorant of pianoforte literature, remained in the hall after the pianist's final retirement, as if, like Oliver Twist, expecting more! A grand "Erard" was used. Mr. Stanley Lucas ably officiated as manager.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann held his second Pianoforte Recital on Wednesday afternoon, when the following programme was performed :—

Sonata (Op. 27)	Beethoven.
Rondo in A minor (Op. 71)	Mozart.
Aus der Kreisleriana (Op. 16), Nos. 4, 5, and 6, and Novellette (Op. 21), No. 7	Schumann.
"Wiegenlied" (by desire)	Henselt.
Rhapsodie, No. 1, (Op. 79)	Brahms.
"Benediction de Dieu"	Liszt.
Valse de Concert (Dedicated to M. Pachmann).	Lamberg.
Nocturne (Op. 37), No. 1; Fantasie in F minor (Op. 49); Etudes, and Tarantella (Op. 43)	Chopin.

The "Sonata" was rendered in a style the most exquisitely poetical, and occupied about fourteen minutes. The excerpts from the "Kreisleriana," were in G minor and B flat. "Cradle Song" of Henselt, in G flat (substituted for Rubinstein's "Mélancolie,") entranced the assembly—a very large one—and ought to have won a bis. Liszt's fine religious piece, in F sharp major gains by every repetition. Lamberg's "Valse," in B minor, sounds rather dull, vague, and undetermined, for the style of the piece. The "Studies" of Chopin were charmingly played; and the second, "a familiar friend," in G flat, was repeated by desire. The "Tarantelle" wound up the audience to a pitch of ecstacy. The hall and the orchestra were crowded. M. De Pachmann will repeat Schumann's "Le Carnaval" to-day (Dec. 22) at a "Saturday Popular." A. M.

The paralytic seizure which came upon Mr. Frederic Clay with such awful suddenness, resulted in complete loss of speech and the use of the limbs on one side. In these respects no improvement is to be expected for some little time it is feared; but as the mischief has not spread, Sir William Jenner is now confident of the ultimate recovery of his patient; and it is gratifying to learn there are signs of improvement, which everyone will rejoice to hear go to justify this good hope.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The annual performance of the "Messiah" took place on Dec. 14th, at St. James' Hall. The soloists included such excellent artists as Miss Santley, Miss A. Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame Isabel Fassett, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Brereton, Mr. H. Jones, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Miss Santley sang very sweetly, "Rejoice greatly," and "Come unto Him." Miss Hilda Wilson's contralto voice was very effective in "He was despised," and Mr. W. H. Cummings delivered the airs, "Behold and see," and "But thou didst not leave," with exquisite pathos. Miss A. Williams and Mr. Cummings sang the soprano and tenor airs of Part II., and Mr. W. H. Brereton undertook "Why do the nations," etc. Madame Isabel Fassett succeeded admirably in the air, "He shall feed His flock." The soprani in the choruses were rather shrill, and the basses made a peculiar "entry" in "For unto us a child is born," once or twice. Excess of staccato must be noted with disapproval in many of the choruses. Not one good piano can be recorded, but the choir, as a rule, sang in tune. The first part, which ended with the chorus, "Lift up your heads," was not over until after ten o'clock. The chorus contained some good material, and the band was made up of well-known artists. Mr. E. J. Hopkins, Mus. Doc., presided carefully and skilfully at the organ, and the conductor was Signor Randegger. Why a foreign musician should have been selected to conduct the performance of a work Englishmen best know the traditions of, for a professedly national society, is one of the mysteries of the art in England, by which the alien is being constantly exalted and benefited to the neglect and loss of the native professor. Without knowing who are the members of the Royal Society of Musicians, the writer does know that no large body of English musicians can exist without counting a dozen or twenty, or perhaps more native artists who could conduct the "Messiah" quite as well, doubtless, as the esteemed foreign teacher who was chosen for this duty the other evening. However, it may be assumed that the committee do not run out of their way to find aliens to accept pensions, intended, it may be presumed, for British artists. The soloists did their work admirably, and it is needless to say how artistically they went through their familiar and several parts chorally; but speaking generally of the broad effects, the music was not so happily rendered. In "Let us break their bonds asunder," for instance, the chorus seemed to be anxious to attach a practical meaning, not intended by the Scriptural text, to the words, by trying to escape from the grip of the conductor, and accompanying instrumentalists. Want of rehearsal may perhaps be urged, but no important performance should have the excuse of want of due preparation. Some of the achieved effects were excellent, however, notwithstanding the too obvious blemishes. The Royal Society of Musicians is one of those solid, well sustained and carefully nurtured benevolent institutions which do so much good in our midst, and of which we may so well be proud of. In keeping with the importance of the institution, a large and influential audience attended the performance now noticed.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

On Wednesday, December 12th, the following selection of music was sung, under the direction of Dr. Bridge :—

Madrigal,	"Sister, awake"	Bateson.
,,	"Cynthia, thy song"	Croce.
,,	"Fair Shepherd's Queen"	Marenzio.
,,	"Fair is the morn"	Taylor.
Motet,	"Hear my prayer"	Haydn.
Madrigal,	"Oft have I vowed"	Wilbye.
,,	"Smile not, fair Amarillis"	Pizzoni.
,,	"Let me careless"	Linley.
Motet,	"Hallelujah, hark those voices"	Elvey.
Madrigal,	"Amarillis, fair as lilies"	Vecchi.
,,	"Draw on, sweet night"	Wilbye.
,,	"Love wakes and weeps"	Read.
,,	"My lady fair doth fly me"	Ferretti.
,,	"A Shepherd with his bonny"	Pilkington.
,,	"Flow, O my tears"	Bennet.
,,	"My bonny Lass"	Morley.

STROLLING PLAYERS' ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society opened their second season with a concert on Dec. 13th, at St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street. The programme was chiefly made up of orchestral music, for the performance of which the society is particularly strong, numbering as it does no fewer than 92 players. Vocal music was not neglected, the "Ave Maria," of Gounod, and other songs by Marzials and Marriott, and a recitative and cavatina from "Ernani," being included in the programme. The vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Miller, and Mr. Hirwen Jones. The orchestra performed with much precision, generally good attack, and excellent style, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, besides which the instrumental portion of the entertainment comprised Handel's Largo in G, the overture from "William Tell," the ballet music from Gounod's "Faust," and a new grand march, called the "Festmarsch," composed expressly for the Society by Herr Otto Standke. There was a large audience, and it was felt that the society has a future of much promise.

OXFORD.

On Thursday evening, Dec. 13th, the Oxford Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," in the Town Hall. The principal soprano part was taken by Madame Clara West, who had repeatedly to bow in response to the heartiest applause. The other solo parts were well sustained, mostly by local talent; and the band and chorus acquitted themselves admirably, under their conductor, Mr. R. Horsley. There was a very good attendance.

BRIGHTON.

The following pieces were included in the programme as undertaken by eight of Mr. E. Aguilar's young lady pupils at the Pavilion, Brighton, on Dec. 15th, viz.:—Preamble, Bach; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Mendelssohn; Fantaisie Impromptu, Chopin; Warum, Schumann; Aufschwung, Schumann; Prelude and Fugue in F, Bach; Sonata quasi Fantasia in C sharp minor, "The Moonlight," Beethoven; Polish Dance, Scharwenka; Ballade in A flat, Chopin; l'Invitation pour la Danse, Weber; Rhapsody (No 1), Brahms; Marche de Nuit, Gottschalk; Nocturne in B, Chopin; Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, Mendelssohn and Liszt; Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 2), Liszt; Etude in A, Thalberg. Mr. Aguilar played the first and last pieces. Mr. Aguilar prefaced the performance by remarking that these essays of pianoforte playing were to be regarded as specimens of ordinary school, or school-room work, as no special preparation had been made. A large audience quite filled the "King's Room," and the performances were all highly creditable. Mr. Aguilar, whose "school" of teaching the instrument is unique and original, may be fairly congratulated on the refined style and excellent command of the keyboard displayed by the pupils. In some cases were noticed a grandeur of style and decision of touch truly remarkable in the case of players so juvenile. The auditors loudly applauded Mr. Aguilar's reading of Bach's "Preamble," and Thalberg's "Study" in A. His recital on Thursday (Dec. 20th), will be noticed next week.

SALISBURY.

The Sarum Choral Society gave their second concert of the season, in the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday evening, the 18th. Gaul's Sacred Cantata, "The Holy City," was given with full band and chorus. The solo vocalists were—Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Sly, Miss Lily Mullings, Mr. John M. Haydon, and Mr. W. Thomas. The work was very successfully rendered by all concerned, and well received. In the second part, Haydn's Symphony (No 11), in D, was very finely played; and Mr. Haydon met with much success in the Air "In Native Worth;" as did also Mr. Thomas, in Pinsuti's "Bedouin Love Song." The concert closed with the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro." Miss Aylward presided at the pianoforte; Mr. Wiltshire at the harmonium; Mr. Gamblin led the orchestra; and Mr. Aylward again conducted with much ability.

The St. Martin's Choral Society gave a successful concert in the Boys' School-room, on the 13th inst., to a large audience. The first part of the programme was devoted to Mendelssohn's "42nd Psalm," which was well rendered. The second part was a miscellaneous selection of songs and part-songs; all of which gave much satisfaction. The soloists were Mrs. Nersling, Miss Fowle, Miss Cothen, and Messrs. Bush and Percy Smith. Mr. Alfred Foley was leader of the orchestra, and the Rev. S. E. Davis conducted.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The pupils of the Royal Irish Academy of Music selected for their performance, on the 30th ult., a recital of the music of "La Sonnambula," by Bellini, which was fairly got through; although at times, it was apparent that the venture was rather too much, especially in the solo parts.—The third concert for this season of the Amateur Orchestral Union took place on the 4th inst. The pieces included overture "Pique Dame," by Suppé; Suite de Ballet, "Reine de Saba," Gounod; the Andante movement from Haydn's Symphony in D, and a March "Habt Acht" (Gung'l). Two piano solos, "Gavotte" and "Musette," by Raff, and an "Impromptu," Chopin, were given by Miss Irwin, whose sister, if I mistake not, gave two violin solos, "Spinnerlied," by Drosdet, and Mendelssohn's famous violin concerto. Some vocal pieces were also introduced into the programme. The orchestral items were under the guidance of the respected conductor, Mr. W. H. Telford, Mus.Bac.—The Dublin Chamber Music Union gave its third concert for this season on the 8th inst. The artists were the same as on previous occasions; and amongst the items on the programme were Mendelssohn's Quartet in B minor (the viola part was sustained by Mr. Griffiths, piano solos by Mons. Billet); "A theme with variations," (Rubinstein); "A la Valse," (St. Saëns); concluding with Beethoven's delightful Serenade, in seven movements. The performance in every way, I am informed, quite sustained the high reputation which the Society has gained for the perfect production of select chamber music.

MANCHESTER.

I have to record the first appearance in England—at Mr. Hallé's concert, last week—of Mr. W. J. Winch, the leading American tenor. Mr. Winch, I understand, contemplates remaining some time in England; and, judging by his reception here, his success is assured. His singing is thoroughly artistic, and his mezza voce especially remarkable.

Signor Patti played a dry and wearisome Concerto of Rubinstein's. The only other item of interest in the programme was one of Dvorak's Rhapsodies.

The Concert Hall is not to collapse. Active friends have come forward and—with a little new blood in the management—a return to the old days of prosperity may be looked for.

MUSIC AT EDINBURGH.

The Edinburgh Choral Union opened its season this week under most auspicious circumstances. Two excellent concerts were given on Monday and Tuesday evenings, the 10th and 11th inst., in the Music Hall; the first being orchestral, the second choral. On Monday evening the programme ran as follows:—

PROGRAMME.—PART 1.

Overture to "Anacréon"	Cherubini.
Suite in D for strings, "In the Olden Time"	Cowen.
Recitative and air, "Waft her, Angels" ("Jephtha")	Handel.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Symphony in A ("Italian")	Mendelssohn.

PART 2.

Overture, "King Lear"	Berlioz.
Walther's prize song, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Introduction to Act III., "Meistersinger"	"
Song, "The Anchor's Weighed"	Braham.
Mr. Joseph Maas.
Ballad Airs, from "Coppelia"	Délibes.

Conductor - - - MR. AUGUST MANNS.

It will be seen that several novelties were included. The band, composed, for the most part, of members of the Saturday Crystal Palace orchestra, played magnificently under Mr. Manns' bâton. The evergreen Italian Symphony went splendidly, especially the first movement. Mr. Joseph Maas was the vocalist, and created quite a furore by his singing of "The Anchor's weighed;" nor was he less successful in "Waft her Angels." On Tuesday, Haydn's "Seasons" was given, and was a great success. Mr. Collinson, the talented organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, who has succeeded Mr. Adam Hamilton as conductor of the Choral Union, assumed the bâton for the first time, and conducted with great care, keeping his forces well in hand. Great credit is due to him for the way in which the choruses were given, the freshness of the voices, and solidity of attack being particularly noticeable. The soloists were—Miss Mary Danes, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Bridson; and it would have been difficult to have selected three artists who would have rendered the various soli with better taste. Miss Danes' singing was, as usual, most pleasing and painstaking. Mr. Bradley gave good service at the organ, such as it is. It is certainly high time that the Music Hall was provided with a better one.

The third concert took place on Monday evening, the 17th inst., when the following programme was performed:—

PART I.

Overture, "Euryanthe"	Weber.
Serenade for Orchestra (composed for the Birmingham Festival, 1882)	Stanford.
(Conducted by the Composer.)
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1 in C	Beethoven.

PART II.

Symphony in G minor, Op. 43	Bennett.
Solos for Pianoforte—Passecaille, Romance, and Serenade and Minuet, "Don Juan"	Thalberg.
Mdme. Montigny-Remaury.
Ballet, "The Dance of the Hours" ("La Gioconda")	Ponchielli.

It will be seen that Dr. Villiers Stanford's Serenade in G, for orchestra, written for the Birmingham Festival of last year, was one of the items performed. That this work will greatly add to the reputation of Dr. Stanford, there can be little doubt. It bears the musician's hand throughout, being full of skilful orchestration. The "Scherzo" is very piquant. The composer conducted his own work, and was loudly applauded at the close of it. Madame Montigny-Rémaury made her first appearance in Edinburgh, and met with a most flattering reception. Her rendering of Beethoven's 1st Concerto in C major, was most brilliant; her touch and execution being alike admirable. She played two or three solos in the second part of the programme. The Romance, by Rubinstein, being very good. Sterndale Bennett's Symphony, in G minor, opened the second part of the concert. It was splendidly played; all the delicate points being brought out with great clearness and finish. We must especially notice the rendering of the charming trio, written for the brass instruments; it was capitally played. Miss Carlotta Elliot was the vocalist, who was, however, somewhat over-weighted in Handel's song. The "Swallow Song,"—from "Esmeralda,"—was well rendered. Two songs by Cowen call for no comment. Mr. Manns conducted with his usual skill. C. H.

PRESTON.

On Friday evening the Preston Choral Society gave a grand performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the New Public Hall, before a large and fashionable audience. The vocalists were: Miss Annie Marriott (soprano), Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke (contralto), Mr. Hy. Guy (tenor), Mr. Santley (bass). The chorus consisted of 260 voices; and the orchestra was occupied by distinguished members of Mr. Charles Hallé's band. Mr. James Tomlinson (organist to the Society) presided at the organ, with great ability, and Signor Risegari ably conducted. Miss Marriott gave the airs and recitatives allotted to her with admirable skill; her sweet voice, of remarkable compass, being heard to the best advantage. Her best effort of the evening was the air "Hear ye Israel." Madame Bolingbroke fully sustained the high character she has earned as a singer, by the careful rendering of her part. In the air "O Rest in the Lord," her fine contralto voice was heard to perfection, and she secured a well merited encore. Mr. Guy ably rendered the tenor airs. Mr. Santley's singing was beyond all praise, and he was frequently encored. The quartets were given with fine effect, and the choruses left nothing to be desired. The concert was a decided success.—On Friday, Dec. 7th, an organ recital and Sacred Concert were given in Lune Street Chapel. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt (of Manchester), and Mr. R. Hilton (principal bass at Westminster Abbey). Mr. T. Hogg presided at the organ, in the absence of Mr. J. Dawber, Mus.Bac., Cantab. Miss Holt sang in a pleasing manner "Let the bright Seraphim" (Handel), and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Handel). Mr. Robert Hilton sang "Nazareth" (Gounod), "Arm, arm, ye brave" ("Judas Maccabæus"; Handel), and sang with Miss Holt the duet, "Graceful consort" ("Creation,"; Haydn). Mr. Hogg rendered, Offertoire in A minor (Batiste), "Fugue in G minor" (Bach), "Sicilian Mariner's Hymn" (Lux) Andante (Dussek), Minuet (Calkin), Communion (Grison), March for the Organ (Dawber). The concert was given in aid of the Wesleyan bazaar, to take place early next year.

BLACKBURN.

The first concert of the ninth season of the Blackburn St. Cecilia Society was given in the Exchange Hall on Monday evening, the 10th inst., and proved to be one of the most successful yet given by the Society.

The programme was a very attractive one, including Dr. Stainer's Cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea,"—together with a miscellaneous selection of songs and orchestral music. The principal vocalists were—Miss Fanny Bristowe (soprano); Mr. Seymour Jackson (tenor), and Mr. Higginson (bass); and they, without exception, sang the music thoroughly well, while the members of the Society sang the choruses in the Cantatas with great breadth of tone and expression; the choruses "Awake, thou that sleepest," "The Wailing Chorus," and the final choruses in both cantatas, evincing the greatest care on the part of the choir and conductor to give a correct reading of the music. Henry Leslie's part-song, "Lullaby of Life," was sung with such delicacy and correctness of phrasing, as to gain an unanimous encore,—a most unusual occurrence at these concerts. The band was selected from Charles Hallé's and De Jong's orchestras, and was, therefore, fully au fait with the somewhat trying accompaniments of Sullivan's work; and the selection in the second part of the concert, Bouillon's "Overture," and the "Love Song" of Taubert, were beautifully rendered. Miss Bristowe received an encore for her singing of Bevignani's "La Fioria;" and Mr. Higginson sang Gounod's "Nazareth" in a very satisfactory manner. Mr. James H. Rooks (of Bradford), the Society's conductor, deserves the highest praise, for the able manner in which he fulfilled his onerous duties; much of the success of the concert being due to his untiring energy and tact. The attendance was large and brilliant.

BROMPTON.—At the Trevor Congregational Church, Trevor Square, Brompton, a performance of sacred music in aid of the repairs fund took place on Dec. 6th. The selections were taken from the two oratorios of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Handel's "Messiah." The principal vocalists by whom they were sustained were as follows:—Miss Annie E. Taylor, R.A.M.; Mrs. Joseph Somes, Miss Annie Layton, the Rev. J. J. Goundry, Mr. A. Montague Shepherd, R.A.M.; Mr. Edward Layton, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. Mr. A. J. Layton, Fell. Coll. Org., accompanied throughout on the church organ, and Mr. Henry A. Evans ably conducted, a strong choir, about sixty in number, comprising the choir of Markham Square Church, and many members of the larger musical societies. The favourite airs and choruses of these well-known oratorios were very creditably rendered throughout, more especially those of the "Messiah," which were given with the greater precision and strength. Mrs. Somes has an excellent soprano voice. Miss Annie Layton made a marked impression. She has a clear contralto voice, and a good enunciation. Mrs. Layton played the organ in a very artistic manner. Her only solo, the pastoral symphony in the "Messiah," was admirably played. Messrs. Edward Layton and Alfred J. Layton, with Mr. A. Montague Shepperd, effectively divided much of the work between them. There was a large and appreciative audience.

BANBURY.

The first concert of the season by the Banbury New Philharmonic Society was given on Dec. 4th at the Exchange Hall, when there was gathered together the largest audience that has yet patronised the society. The programme on this occasion consisted of Mendelsohn's "42nd Psalm," Costa's serenata, "The Dream," and a miscellaneous selection. The society had again given preference to local talent, and had engaged Miss Ferrari as the leading soloist. Her performance on the last occasion was all that could be wished, and it was therefore only right that her ability should be recognised. The only other outside element was that imported by Mr. John Probert, tenor, of the London Ballad Concerts, and who possesses a pleasing voice of much capacity. The quintet, "The Lord hath commanded," was sung by Miss Ferrari and Messrs. P. S. Edmunds, F. P. Edmunds, W. Thompson, and W. Walkley. Mr. M. J. Monk wielded the bâton, and is to be complimented on the success of the concert. The accompaniments were played by Miss Lewis (pianoforte) and Mr. Walter Clough (organ), assisted during a portion of the concert by Miss Fortescue on the harp. The choruses were rendered by a choir of about a hundred voices.

WANDSWORTH TOWN HALL.—Miss Rozel Ayers' evening concert was given on Tuesday evening in the Town Hall. Praise is due to Miss Hipwell for her rendering of "Daddy" (Behrend), and for the song, "I cannot tell you why" (Barri). Mr. Edward Levetus gave "Only once more," and Pinsuti's "Queen of the Earth," both of which were fairly done. Air Varié (Vieuxtemps) was performed on the violin by Mr. Sternberg with good effect. An encore was demanded of Miss Edith Blair for "The Children of the City." A capital duet on "Don Juan" was rendered by Miss Rozel Ayers and Mr. Bambridge. The conductors of the entertainment were Mr. Stafford Trego, Mus.Bac., Oxon., and Mr. E. M. Flavell, R.A.M. There was a large attendance.

OLDHAM.—On Thursday evening, Dec. 13th, a concert was given by the Oldham Vocal Society, in the Town Hall. The first part opened with the Cantata, "The Ancient Mariner," by J. F. Barnett. The conductor and accompanist was Mr. Joseph Clafton. The performance of the Cantata reflected much credit upon the conductor, and the Society, by the manner of its performance. The audience was both critical and appreciative, but was exceedingly select.

READING.—The annual popular concert of the United Band of Hope and Temperance Choir was given on Dec. 4th. There was a large attendance. A varied programme was presented, and the solo vocalists were Miss Susie Fenn, R.A.M., and Mr. C. Abercrombie, gentleman of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal; a further noteworthy attraction being provided in the presence of Miss Marie Schumann, of the Guildhall School of Music, whose accomplished mastery of the violin was already well known to the people of Reading. A source of sympathetic disappointment was the enforced absence of the respected conductor of the choir, Mr. Waite, through sudden indisposition; but his place was ably filled by Mr. Marsh. Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., Oxon., undertook the tasks of solo organist and accompanist, in both of which he acquitted himself with his usual ability. The choir numbered 250 voices, and, speaking generally, they have not been heard to greater advantage. The chorus "O Father, whose Almighty Power" was a good performance, and other pieces were also effectively rendered; the whole testifying to the perfect training which the choir have undergone, and the wide range of composition which they have successfully traversed. Miss Fenn was, in each of her songs, rewarded with hearty plaudits. Mr. Abercrombie fully merited the appreciative expressions which followed his various performances. His excellent voice found full scope in the air from Handel, "Where'er you walk," which he sang with great pathos; and his singing was much enjoyed in the two other pieces. Unquestionably the great feature of the evening was the violin playing of Miss Schumann. The talent this youthful artist displayed from the first, in the treatment of the violin, has much matured under the skilled direction of the Guildhall School professors; and there can be little doubt that her early promise will be realised in a very distinguished career. She took a liberal share in the programme, contributing three solos, and responding once to what appeared to be, the too exacting demands of the audience. The success of the concert was largely due to the able way in which Mr. Read presided at the organ and piano, and not less for his solo on the organ, Batiste's Offertoire in F minor.

BABBACOMBE.—Disappointment has been expressed by the congregation of All Saints' Church, Babbacombe, at the resignation of their respected and talented organist, Mr. Claude R. Fowles. That gentleman was originally appointed in March, 1878; but four years afterwards he was compelled, in consequence of ill-health, to relinquish the duties. Later on Mr. Fowles was requested to resume his connection with the church, and has held office up to the present time. Mr. Fowles produced the masses of Schubert, Gounod, Mozart, and other composers, which were on several occasions rendered by a full string band, in addition to the ordinary choir and organ. He has the esteem of the clergy and members of the congregation, and his resignation has been received with universal regret.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Early this month Dr. Hans von Bülow played a Raff programme at Wiesbaden.

A new choral society has been formed in Rome under the title of "Società Royale Palestrina."

Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" is to be given presently at St. Petersburg and Moscow.

A new alto clarionet has been invented by M. Roze, a member of one of the Paris orchestras.

A new opera, "Antonius und Cleopatra," by E. F. Wittgenstein, has been successfully played in Graz.

Felix Weingartner's opera, "Sakuntala," will probably receive its first hearing in Weimar, next February.

Sophie Menter has been giving pianoforte recitals to enthusiastic audiences in Odessa.

Maurice Dengremont, the young violinist, gave no less than thirty-eight concerts in Germany from October 15th to November 21st inclusive.

The Parisian paper L'Art Musical, founded by the late M. Escudier, and afterwards the property of the publisher Girod, has been acquired by the publishing house of Leduc.

Anton Rubinstein has begun a concert tour through Germany. His two first appearances at Dresden and Leipsic were the cause of much enthusiasm.

A new opera, "Helianthus," by Herr Adalbert Goldschmidt, who has written his own libretto, is to be produced at Leipzig shortly.

The announcement is made that a complete edition of Schubert's works, on the model of the editions of Mozart and Beethoven, published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, will be issued.

After an artistic tour through Germany, Sarasate has proceeded to Russia. In March he is expected in Paris, and the following month will visit London.

A sensation was created at one of M. Lamoureux's recent concerts at the Château d'Eau, Paris, when Bach's dramatic cantata, "Der Streit zwischen Phœbus und Pan," was performed.

Herr Brahms's new symphony is said to have produced a marked effect on its recent first performance by the Philharmonic Society of Vienna. The introduction and finale are described as especially fine.

Ambroise Thomas had a very flattering reception lately at the hands of the Antwerp public. The occasion was a concert given in his honour by the Société Royale d'Harmonie, when the programme was exclusively formed of the French composer's works.

A new manuscript work called "Sainte Cécile," curiously styled an oratorio melodrama, by R. P. de Doss was recently heard in Liège, and appears to have made a favourable impression.

A point of law has recently been decided at Paris. Herr Angelo Neumann brought an action against M. Lamoureux for performing the first act of "Lohengrin" at one of his concerts at Paris. The verdict of the court is that a rendering of the music without scenery, dresses, or acting, is not a performance in the sense assumed by Herr Neumann, who has to pay M. Lamoureux 500 francs damages, besides the costs incurred by the trial.

The papers of Milan speak of a new opera entitled "Nerone," written by an English musician, Mr. George Carter, well known in his own country for other excellent compositions. Among other things, it is stated that musicians of note having seen the score of "Nerone," judge it as being very skilful, replete with melody and clear orchestral effects. Unfortunately in Italy professors have much difficulty in coming to the front, and it seldom happens that they are in a position to place the efforts of their genius on the stage. But if the music of Mr. Carter is as beautiful as is reported in Milan, why does not "blonde Albion" open the way of honour to one of her gifted sons? Why do they not place on the stage this "Nerone"? Is the proverb also true in England: "No one is a prophet in his own country." So writes L'Artes of Trieste, on Nov. 30th.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE circular announcing the seventy-second season of the Philharmonic Society, has just been issued. A series of six concerts is to be given next year, commencing in February. Before this time arrives, and during the recess in concert-giving which obtains at Christmas-tide, it will be well to reflect on what this society has done for the art of music, and to take into consideration its aims and present position.

In the limited space that can here be allotted to an article, it would be impossible to do more than glance at the history of the Society, and recount in the briefest possible way its past achievements. There is indeed little necessity to do this in detail. The account of the Philharmonic Society written by its old Secretary, G. HOGARTH, and the excellent article concerning it in Sir GEORGE GROVE'S Dictionary, to which the name of Mr. STANLEY LUCAS is appended, supply sufficient general information. As, however, these books are not available to all who are interested in the Society, a few remarks may be permitted on the past career of the institution, before coming to the special purpose to which attention is desired to be called.

When the annals of English music come to be written by some pen at once equal to the difficult task, and in full sympathy with the theme to be illustrated, surely the history of the society quietly founded by CRAMER, CORRI, and DANCE in 1813, will form a chapter of the deepest interest!—an interest, it may be pointed out, by no means confined to the art in this country, but radiating far and wide over the whole civilised world that recognizes the dignity and rejoices in the delights of sweet sounds. Musicians are indebted to the Philharmonic Society of London for many a work since become immortal that it has commissioned and first brought forward. From the year which succeeded its birth, when £200 was accorded to CHERUBINI for a new symphony and overture, some music being also commissioned from BEETHOVEN, down to 1867, when Sir ARTHUR SULLIVAN'S classical "Marmion" overture was written by request, what a long list of new and valuable music, produced under its ægis is entered on the roll of the old Society! To catalogue no more than SPOHR'S No. 2, BEETHOVEN'S colossal Choral, and MENDELSSOHN'S Italian Symphonies, and the "Infelice" scena, is to recall to mind works of genius that must ever rank as masterpieces of the art. Again and again has the Philharmonic supplied us with fresh compositions that occupy an important place among the classics of music. So long ago as forty-two years, BERLIOZ'S "Benvenuto Cellini" overture was heard there for the first time in England; and to show that despite its green old age the Society is still undecayed in vigour, it was but two seasons ago that the same composer's neglected, but wondrous "Romeo and Juliet" music, was first completely revealed to the astonished and somewhat sceptical musicians of London, under the painstaking direction of Mr. CUSINS. All MENDELSSOHN'S symphonies, save the posthumous "Reformation," as well as his poetical violin concerto, "Athalie," music, and "Ruy Blas" overture were first brought to a hearing under its auspices, the composer himself wielding the bâton; similar services were rendered to most of BEETHOVEN'S symphonies, his pianoforte concertos, grand Mass in D, and music to "Egmont"; SCHUMANN'S B flat Symphony, "Genoveva" overture, and his cantata "Paradise and the Peri"; WAGNER'S magnificent prelude to "Tannhäuser," and the "Rienzi" overture, together with a selection from his "Lohengrin"; RUBINSTEIN'S pianoforte concerto in G, "Paradise Lost," and Dramatic Symphony, GADE'S A minor symphony, and overture to "Ossian." To this brief epitome, space will only permit to be added the honoured names of the following composers, as among those who have enjoyed the distinction of having had some of their important contributions to music first introduced at the Philharmonic Society's concerts:—MOSCHELES, MOLIQUE, HILLER, GOUNOD, SILAS, MACFARREN, MAX BRUCH, STERNDALE BENNETT, BARNETT, COWEN, RAFF, and BRAHMS; all names entitled to honour in the realm of music.

The services rendered by the Philharmonic have not been confined merely to the production and presentation of music to English audiences. Nearly all the great players have made their début at the Society's concerts. The artistic recognition there accorded confers world-wide celebrity, for the cachet of the Philharmonic is respected far and wide. LISZT, still living and working, made his first appearance there in a concerto of HUMMEL'S, so long ago as fifty-six years, and just seventeen years after, in 1844, the prince of violinists, JOACHIM, first came before a London audience, playing BEETHOVEN'S violin concerto. MENDELSSOHN played again and again, ever meeting with that hearty appreciation to which his genius entitled him. It would occupy more than a column to catalogue merely the names of the distinguished artists who have assisted at the six hundred concerts the Society has given since its foundation. It is sufficient to say that from ROMBERG, who appeared in 1814, down to Herr de PACHMANN, who played last season, nearly every artist and composer of note has been afforded the opportunity of playing or singing there. Among the honoured names of those who have conducted its concerts, are to be found those of CLEMENTI, CHERUBINI, SPOHR, WEBER, MENDELSSOHN, HILLER, WAGNER, GOUNOD, MOSCHELES, HUMMEL, Sir HENRY BISHOP, Sir GEORGE SMART, Sir STERNDALE BENNETT, Sir MICHAEL COSTA, and Mr. W. G. CUSINS.

It would require a lengthy essay to trace out, and comment on the value of the work done by the Philharmonic Society. As becomes the foremost musical institution of our land, it has ever been the encourager and exponent of the highest and best forms of music. For many years past it has held aloft the sacred lamp of pure art, and its banner is proudly emblazoned with triumphs, such as no other musical institution can boast of. May the time be far distant when that banner comes to be suspended in the Temple of Art as a relic of the past. Through the energy and sound judgment with which the affairs of the Society have been directed, it has gained a firm hold on the sympathies of the public. If its Directors will only adhere to the same high standard, and—bearing in mind that art is progressive and acknowledges no finality—accord a place on their programmes to composers of the day, whose works exhibit distinct merit, then the support granted to the institution in the past, is not likely to become lessened in the future.

One can hardly help indulging in the remembrance of an episode in the history of the Society, showing that it is something more than a mere concert-giving institution. Amidst the treasures in the library of the Philharmonic, there is perhaps none more highly valued than the touching letter written by BEETHOVEN but eight days before his death. In this, the mighty tone poet expresses heartfelt thanks for the receipt of the £100 which the Society, in answer to his appeal, had despatched to the sorrowing and suffering musician. It is indeed something to move the heart and stir the pulse of us English musicians, to know that it was to our land that BEETHOVEN turned when distress seemed upon him, rather than to his German friends. We are proud to remember that the Philharmonic Society did not flinch from the duty devolving upon it from its prominent position, granting an immediate response to the expressed wants of the dying musician. To say that the Directors of the day did their duty, is to accord the highest praise that can be given. BEETHOVEN's own words were:—"Should Heaven only be "pleased to restore me again to health, I will prove "to the noble English how much I value their sym- "pathy in my melancholy fate."

There now remains one question connected with the Philharmonic to which the attention of the readers of this paper is especially requested. That is, the very important matter of support. The concerts of the Society must necessarily be expensive. Mingled with much pecuniary success, the institution has had its times of difficulty and trouble. Its most disastrous season was that of 1855, when the fortunes of the Society under the direction of WAGNER fell to a low ebb. Happily, STERNDALE BENNETT, who took office in the following year, rescued it from the dilemma that it had been left it in; his reign as conductor was successful financially, as well as artistically. In the year 1875, losses again occurred, necessitating further sales of its monies funded in more prosperous times. In 1881, the stock became exhausted, and a guarantee fund was formed among the subscribers and supporters of the Society. This answered very well the purpose for which it was intended; as the season did not result in a profit, a trifling pro rata call was made on the guarantors, and the Directors of the year were relieved from an anxious responsibility. Neither the profession nor the public seem thoroughly to recognize the devotion to their onerous duties, and the zeal for the interests of the Society that its Directors have ever displayed. They freely give up much valuable time in occupying themselves with its affairs, and, moreover, assume a serious pecuniary responsibility as to its finances. Such devotion should do more than excite our gratitude, it ought to enlist our help. In two ways can this help be accorded. First, by attending and subscribing to the concerts of the Society, and secondly, by wellwishers to the Philharmonic inscribing their names among the guarantors for the coming season. The first list (just published) shows a promise of nearly £1,300. It may be, that not a penny of this will be called for. The last season was so successful that not only was none of the guarantee wanted, but a profit was made on the concerts, and some money again funded. The risk, therefore, seems a distant one; in any case it can hardly amount to more than a few shillings in the pound. The Guarantee Form runs as follows:—

"In the event of the seventy-second season of the Philhar- "monic Society being attended with pecuniary loss, I hereby "guarantee to pay you the sum of £ , or any proportion of "that amount which I may become liable to pay, pro rata, with "other guarantors of the said season of 1884."

The various reforms that from time to time have been introduced into the composition of the Society have invigorated its constitution; they give a healthy augury for the future, in spite of its having to compete with powerful rivals, and contend with various concert speculators for public favour. English music is rapidly coming to the fore, and our composers are daily better able to hold their own against all comers. One is glad to perceive that of late, the policy of the Directors has been to accord a hearing to native writers, while not neglecting foreign composers of distinction. Here is a feature, on the score of which our support can fairly be claimed. Every one, and every institution has at certain periods to strike a balance between successes and failures; no one is wise at all times—as the Latin grammar of by-gone days used to teach us. And so, the Society at times has made mistakes, and laid itself open to criticism. Fair criticism is never to be feared, but that differs very much from the prescient self-satisfaction of those, who, on imperfect knowledge, condemn in advance every arrangement that does not conform to their nostrums, or run just on the lines they think should be followed. Such dogmatists ostentatiously invite the world to display a perfect confidence in their ability to advise, quite touching as to its sympathy, and amusing for the assurance exhibited. Others discourse over the past, and perform the interesting feat of being wise after the event. Just now, in certain quarters, there obtains a worship of conductors, together with an extravagance of language respecting their supposed qualifications, that betrays considerable ignorance, and want of sound judgment. In the old times, it is quite true that there were few good conductors. But with modern training, widened experience, and general culture, the matter has been entirely altered, and now we can boast of having a dozen and more capable conductors. Give a good painstaking conductor a reliable and experienced band, and in all probability you will get a satisfactory rendering of any work.

The section of the British public frequenting high class concerts is daily becoming more educated. Musical people are now better able to judge the value of the utterances of some of the specialists, who set up their wisdom to confound the opinions of others, presumably less perfectly instructed. These remarks are suggested by the attacks that have already appeared on the novel arrangement that has been made as to each concert of the coming season being directed by a different conductor. But Messrs. BARNETT, COWEN, MOUNT, and VILLIERS STANFORD, together with Sir ARTHUR SULLIVAN, who will conduct his "In Memoriam" overture, are no novices. With the excellent band placed at their disposal, it will be strange indeed if they do not give us good performances. Herr EDWARD GRIEG, Dr. FERDINAND VON HILLER, and Herr ANTONIN DVORAK, who are also to conduct and will produce new works, are musicians of continental reputation, quite equal to the task assigned to them.

There remains but another sentence to say. That is, the urging of those friends of the Philharmonic Society who may read these lines, not to dismiss the matter now brought before them, relegating the duty of support to others. If they have at heart the welfare of the institution, let them apply to CHARLES E. STEPHENS, Esq., of 37, Howley Place, W., the Hon. Treasurer, or to HENRY HERSEE, Esq., the Hon. Sec., St. James's Hall, for a Guarantee Form to fill in, and add their names to the list of supporters. The individual guarantees already announced, range from sums of £100 to £5, and afford a satisfactory proof of the estimation and confidence with which the arrangements of the Directors for the coming season are regarded by the friends of the institution.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

XVII.

In remarking that the austerity of the rules lessen as the employed number of parts increases, CHERUBINI observes that "Unisons (or rather notes of the same "name of different octaves) are tolerated in a large "number of parts, as well as are two fifths by con-"trary motion, even between the two extreme parts." As already shown, this increased liberty is a rightful freedom; but it may be pointed out that the extension of the license regarding successions of perfect concords between external parts by contrary motion, ought to be a matter of rarity. Such progressions even the fullest harmony are apt to be suggestive of weakness, and are best avoided. In all contrapuntal combinations of any number of parts, it is well as far as possible, to treat the outside voices as two-part counterpoint, on the ground of their extreme prominence as outlining the mass of harmony in action. The licenses to employ "two fifths by direct move-"ment when one is perfect and the other imperfect," to quote CHERUBINI, in a large number of parts, and to use leaps of a major sixth (this may surely be done at all times and in any number of parts), are matters so natural and sensible as to call for no further comment. By the way, in Mrs. COWDEN CLARKE'S valuable translation of CHERUBINI, published by NOVELLO & Co., this passage is somewhat confused, unless altered in a recent edition, by the license to take leaps of major sixths being connected as a sub-sentence with the words just previously allowing the immediate proximity of a "perfect and a diminished or "imperfect fifth." However, the passage is doubtless clear enough to all students, and it is correctly rendered in J. A. HAMILTON'S early translation printed by COCKS & Co. in 1837. CHERUBINI observes that "in florid counterpoint having from five to eight "parts, when two, three, or four parts only are pro-"ceeding at the same time, the same strict precepts "which were laid down in the rules for two-part, "three-part, and four-part counterpoint, hold good; "and it is only when five, six, seven, or eight parts "proceed together, that any abatement of the severity "of the rules may be fairly claimed." This is logical, seeing that the thinning of the score to a small or average number of parts for a time, restores to the listener a larger and usual power of perceptivity with regard to the tracing out of contrapuntal action. The Florentine theorist alludes to the two methods of writing in eight parts, by placing the two parts of each kind under each other as first and second throughout, the score, which is thus piled up with all the parts in their real position in the harmonic strata; or by writing for two choirs, each body of voices having its own score so to speak. He further points out that the ancient masters took care to render the harmony of each choir complete as far as possible, when employing the double choir scheme. They imposed this conditon upon themselves on account of the distance frequently intervening between the choral bodies in order that complete harmony should be heard by all listeners, whether near one choir or the other; at the same time, adds CHERUBINI, this condition is not indispensable. It may be remarked indeed that many striking effects may be obtained by departing from such a rule as in the use of sustained doubled pedal notes in one choir and the employment of moving parts in the other, and as in the enunciation by one choir of perfect concords, and by the presence of successions of imperfect concords in the harmony of the other. CHERUBINI judiciously recommends the student to advance in the use of a large number of parts, by first using two trebles, then two contraltos, then two tenors, and lastly two basses. For six voices he advises the student to similarly double alternately any two of the distinct and representative parts; and to proceed in a corresponding manner to advance in the practice of scoring for seven and eight parts, when at last all the representative parts are doubled.

The student is not likely in these days to venture to write as TALLIS did in forty parts, or as has been done for six choirs, or by way of a crowning perplexity for twenty-four choirs (ninety-six voices); a needless feat of which MARPURG furnishes an example in the shape of an overgrown canon. Indeed, eight part writing is rarely useful or effective, especially when accompanied by all the tonal ramifications of an orchestral score. It must be added that, however imposing in theory, in real practice double choir music, when the choirs are placed close to each other as in a concert-room and accompanied by a large orchestra, does not furnish those striking antiphonal effects the imagination of the listener or the examiner of a score might anticipate. This is in part to be accounted for by the limited hearing powers of even the best trained listeners in fully realising the ingenious overplus of musical riches provided by the lavish composer, and a want of distance between the two choirs to give picturesque power to the antiphonal enunciations. If two choirs are employed in the orchestra the wind instruments should be sparely used. HANDEL'S "Israel "in Egypt" is probably never so effective chorally as when accompanied according to the original scheme, by the strings, with only oboes, trumpets, and drums to occasionally brighten and lighten up the choral masses. CHERUBINI points out that considerable latitude is allowable in seven or eight parts, in the way of permitting double suspensions of a free character and in allowing the sixth to be struck against the seventh, the octave against the ninth, etc., providing the parts move clearly and boldly on their several courses, and providing the dissonant sounds are not as a rule too close together, as would be the case with seconds, and granting that the parts move conjunctly. In full masses of harmony, excellent effects may indeed be obtained by the bold and courageous employment of progressions which would not be tolerable in a thin score of the four customary parts.

The Society of Arts' Journal has a good portrait of the late Sir W. Siemens. The new chairman of the Society's council will be Sir Frederick Abel.

From Rome we hear that Mr. W. G. Cusins, who is just now recruiting his health in Italy, has been elected an honorary member of the Academy of St. Cecilia.

Reviews.

Trio for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, by C. Gurlitt (Augener and Co.)—This composer enjoys in Germany a reputation for writing refined and graceful pieces, free from the harshness that characterizes so much modern original music. The trio, a pleasing example of his style, is expressly labelled "easy" (In leichten style). It consists of three movements—an allegro, andantino, and finale vivace. The correct and classical construction of the work may well serve as a model to young writers; but it is not necessary to bestow praise on its form. This should rather be accorded to the poetical feeling that so deftly clothes the main scaffolding. Some of the variations are ingenious, and the finale is a reflex—though an independent one—of the gaiety and brio to be found in the delightful works of this character, written by Papa Haydn.

May Joy come to Greet Thee, by G. A. Osborne (Metzler and Co.)—A long life of ceaseless activity has not diminished Mr. Osborne's ardour for the art of which he is still a conspicuous ornament. It is a common remark that when musicians have long been engaged in the daily round of teaching, they gradually lose artistic sensibility, and become mechanical exponents rather than sympathetic disciples. The remark is in many cases but too true, but there are plenty of exceptions to the contrary. Such an one is old Kalkbrenner's favourite pupil, and the whilom friend of Chopin, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, and other famous dead musicians. Those who enjoy the privilege of hearing Mr. Osborne play, whether it be a sonata of Beethoven, a fugue by Bach, a piece by Liszt or Rubinstein, or one of the nocturnes of his idol Chopin, can testify that the soul which gives life to music, and the fingers under obedient control that do their perfect illustrative duty, are still to be found united in him; his true artist playing satisfies and touches one, as it must have done our fathers many years ago. Though George Osborne thoroughly enjoys his well-earned leisure, he still favours us with some of his thoughts; and whether it is a paper he reads before the members of the Musical Association, or such a trifle as a song, his productions are always marked by a freshness of thought, which compels attention and ensures approval. In the song under notice, he has supplied to Miss Marion Chappell's sensible and tasteful words, a most appropriate setting. Specially notable is a little octave figure in the accompaniment, which occurring again and again in major and minor mode, haunts the ear by its quaintness.

Chant du Gondolier, pour le Piano. Six Morceaux de Piano, by J. B. Wekerlin (W. Czerny).—Mr. Wekerlin is an original thinker, and his music always possesses a charm of its own. Though his pieces are slight, the diction is by no means common, and the sentiments reflected appeal with success to those possessing cultivated taste. All the pieces here noticed may be commended. The "Gondola song" is a suave melody in F, with an interlude in D flat, the return to the initial key being cleverly managed. Of the serial pieces, No. 1, "Rose de Noël," is an elegant Romance; 2, a "Madrigal," a quaint thought, the syncopated accent of a secondary theme being striking and uncommon; 3 is an Allemande, somewhat in the form of the old German Ländler; 4 is a simple Passacaile; 5, an elegant little sonnet; and 6, a minuet which presents several points of novel interest.

A Christmas Carol, Words by Frank Silvester, Music by G. Gaffe, F.C.O. (Weekes and Co., 14, Hanover Street).—Words and music are alike excellent. A good effect is obtained in some sentences by the soprano and tenor taking the theme in octaves, while the alto and bass support the harmony in the refrain "Gloria in excelsis." The compact verbal sentences are tunefully set in the traditional pastoral manner, and the carol deserves popular favour.

A Christmas Carol, Words by W. E. Lloyd Trevor, Music by A. C. White (J. Masters, Bond Street).—Set in March form with a well-marked melody, closely harmonised (though the bass is carried too low in the episodical passage), and preluded by the familiar ring of a peal of bells. The little piece will be found effective in performance.

Liszt's "Christus" was given lately by the Hamburg Bach Society.

LIVERPOOL.

An organ recital was given in St. George's Hall, by Mr. W. T. Best, on Thursday, December 13th. The following was the programme:—

Overture, "Die Letzen Dinge"	Spohr
Andante, "Priere"	Benoit.
Fugue in E flat major	Albrechtsberger.
Air, "Sombre Forêt"	Rossini.
Canzonetta from the First Quartet	Mendelssohn.
Andante (Six Concert Pieces, No. 5)	Best.
Triumphal March, "Sardanapalus"	Hatton.

And on Saturday, December 15th:—

Overture, "Sosarme"	Handel.
Chorus, "La Carità"	Rossini.
Organ Sonata No. 4, in B flat major	Mendelssohn.
Marche Solennelle in E flat minor	Schubert.
Scherzo for the Organ	Best.

An organ recital was given on Wednesday, December 19th, in Great Homer Street Wesleyan Chapel, by Mr. Henry Grimshaw. The following was the programme:—

Overture for the Organ in E	Morandi.
Air with variations in F major	Wely.
Fantasia and Fugue in C minor	Bach.
First Overture on Christmas Carols	Guilmant.
March, with "Hymn of Priests"	Chauvet.
Elevation in F major	Batiste.
Choruses, "Worthy is the Lamb," and "Amen" ("Messiah")	Handel.

NORWICH.

The last afternoon organ recital before Christmas was given by Dr. Bunnett, F.C.O., in the St. Andrew's Hall, on Saturday, December 15th. The following was the programme:—

Fanfare	Lemmens.
Pastorale (For Christmas-tide)	Corelli.
The "Cuckoo and Nightingale" Concerto Adagio and Allegro.	Handel.

BOLTON.

An organ recital was given in the Albert Hall, on Saturday, December 15th, by the borough organist, Mr. Wm. Mullineux, F.C.O. The following was the programme:—

Processional March in C major	Van-Eyken.
Communion for the Organ in E flat	Batiste.
Grand Offertoire in G major (No. 4)	Wely.
Cantilène Pastorale	Guilmant.
Serenade, "Good night! beloved"	Balfe.
Overture from the Incidental Music to "Henry VIII."	Sullivan.

An organ recital was given by Mr. Charles J. Whittington, on Dec. 14th, at the Argyle Square Church, W.C. Vocal selections were introduced by the church choir.

At the Lay Wesleyan College, Cambridge, a small effective two-manual organ, built by Mr. A. Kirkland, of Wakefield, was recently opened by Mr. F. O. Carr, Mus.Bac., whose playing is pronounced to be exellent.

An organ recital was given by Mr. E. H. Turpin, at the Trinity Congregational Chapel, Poplar, on Dec. 19th. The vocalists were Miss H. Akroyd, Mrs. Harrison, and Miss Maud Vivian. Mr. E. Blandford was the accompanist.

On Dec. 20th, the annual Advent Service, including Handel's "Messiah," was given at St. John's, Ealing Dean. The Rev. Julius Summerhayes, the vicar, conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin was the organist. The music was effectively sung, and a large congregation attended the service.

The addition of another organ studio, with an organ with two Manuals and Pedal at Mr. Fincham's, 150, Euston Road, in a conveniently accessible position will be a welcome item of news to the numerous and increasing class of organ students. The possibility of getting regular practice must add to the popularity of the organ, as a more available instrument and another organ studio in a central position are a distinct gain.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

Last Saturday the organist was Dr. Bridge, who introduced a novelty in the shape of stringed accompaniments, to a couple of Handel's concertos. The band consisted of about 20 strings, selected from the Highbury Philharmonic Society, and Dr. Gladstone conducted. The concertos were very admirably performed, and received with great applause, and gave evident pleasure to the crowded audience, who were delighted with the innovation, which can only be regarded as a step in the right direction. Dr. Bridge played with his usual skill, and received a hearty welcome. The vocalist, a Madame Cecilia Grey, an American lady, received a recall for "Softly sighs;" but in her other selections appeared to be suffering from the nervousness incidental to a first appearance. It must be allowed that she sings in German better than she sings in English. It should be noted that Dr. Bridge introduced into the concerto, No. 2, set 2, a cadenza of his own. The concerto No. 1, set 2, though less known, is quite as enjoyable as the popular No. 2, set 1. The organ solos included "Andante," from a symphony in E flat; Haydn, "Serenade" (Schubert); "Introduction and Double Fugue (Silas); "Air varied" (Lemmens); and Fugue on the name of Bach (J. S. Bach). To-night Dr. Pringuer will be the organist, and the choir of his church will sing a selection of Christmas music. After to-night these notable Recitals will stop until Jan. 26th. The work done so far this season, and the consequent success, are matters for sincere congratulations, and show there is no falling off in these, the most famous organ recitals in the world.

Correspondence.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In the last issue of your journal appears a paragraph respecting the above institution, suggestive of a matter that has for some time been discussed in private circles, and to which an official answer might now well be given. The paragraph in question states, that on the occasion of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh recently visiting the school, portions of quartets were performed by students of Mr. H. Holmes' ensemble class. Among the names of the performers are to be found those of Dolmetch, Kreuz, and Werge. These names are unquestionably German. Will Sir George Grove, the courteous Director of the institution, inform us whether these lads are English born? and if they were British subjects at the date of their admission to our new national school? A rumour to the contrary has long obtained, and indeed it is asserted that one youth did us the honour to come direct from Cologne to the Royal College, innocent of the language of his new adopted country. It may be that rumour is entirely wrong in supposing that foreigners, who have plenty of conservatoires of music of their own, would elect to come over here, and be educated at the expense of the British public, rather than study under their own distinguished countrymen. As public subscriptions have been collected for the Royal College, and are still solicited, the question is clearly a public one, and should be answered. A line from Sir George Grove would at once set this matter right, and possibly enlist support to his school from a section of our people, who at present object to tax themselves for the benefit of strangers.

Yours, &c.,

S. M. EAGLETON.

Passing Events.

In the pantomime for Her Majesty's Theatre, "Red Riding Hood," some choruses for children's voices by Mr. W. C. Levey are to be introduced in a market place scene.

Miss A. Presscott's valuable pamphlet on "Form or Design in Music" has been reprinted from the columns of the Musical World by Messrs. Duncan Davison and Co.

It seems that a poll of the congregation of St. Stephen's, Westminster, on the question of vesting the choir in surplices, has resulted in a vote of 514 in favour, with only 60 against.

Mdme. Essipoff has accepted an engagement to play at the Philharmonic concerts next spring: she will appear, it is understood, at two soirées. All admirers of the pianoforte will rejoice to hear this good news.

The announcement is made that the performances of the English Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Friend, will commence early in January, with Victor Nesler's romantic opera, "The Piper of Hamelin."

As a sign of our increased love of music in England, it may be noted that it is supposed that in no pre-Christmas winter season have so many concerts been given, or so much musical activity been displayed as during the past few weeks.

Our readers will regret to hear that, on leaving the Savage Club, the other evening, Mr. Barrett, the eminent flute player, was set upon by some miscreants, robbed of a presentation watch recently given him, and very seriously injured.

A choral competition on a large scale, and a great Tonic Sol-fa festival is to be held at the Crystal Palace, on June 14th. The adjudicators are Messrs. J. Stainer, M.A., Mus.Doc., Henry Leslie, and E. H. Turpin.

Mr. W. G. Cusins announces a Christmas performance of the "Messiah" on the 24th at St. James' Hall. Handel's chef-d'œuvre is, it is true, a safe thing to give, but it is time Bach's Christmas Oratorio and other seasonable works are remembered.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was well rendered, say the local papers, in St. John's Cathedral, Denver, Colorado, U.S., lately, at a Thanksgiving Service, under the direction of the organist, Mr. W. E. Hall, F.C.O. Brass instruments were employed with the organ.

Mr. Weist Hill, principal of the Guildhall School of Music, directed a concert of the students at the Mansion House on Dec. 8th. The principal feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." The Guildhall Choir, an excellent choral force, sang the choruses in the "Walpurgis Night," Mr. Faning's "The Vikings," etc., with due effect.

The congregation of Christ Church, Claughton, Birkenhead, have recognised Mr. E. T. Driffield's arduous labours as honorary organist and choir-master during the last three years by a birthday gift of a magnificent silver tea service and tray and beautiful gilt clock and ornaments, valued at one hundred guineas. The choir added their quota in the form of an elegant china tea and coffee service.

On Dec. 10th, the Borough of Hackney Choral Association gave its second subscription concert at Shoreditch Town Hall, when Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mozart's "Prague" Symphony (in D), and a selection from Weber's "Oberon," were the chief works performed. This excellent society is doing honest and good work in the best interests of the art.

The papers have the following:—A new singer is expected to create a sensation at the opera this season. His story is slightly romantic. When Patti was down at her château in South Wales she heard a great deal of a miner who had a lovely voice. She not only heard of him, but she heard him, and the result of the performance was that the miner left the scene of his industrial labours, and cultivated such musical capacity as he combined with his rich voice, and will come out this season—if all be well—a great baritone.

Votes for the May election will be duly appreciated for the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, on behalf of Lionel George Craxford. The boy's father was blind and friendless. He became a clever and industrious pupil of Dr. W. H. Monk, and was appointed organist of the Parish Church of Heydour, in Lincolnshire, where for fourteen years he was highly esteemed. In November, 1881, he died suddenly of paralysis of the brain, leaving a sorrowful widow and five very young children with no provision whatever. Proxies will be gratefully accepted by Mrs W. H. Monk, Glebe Field, Stoke Newington, N.

Mr. Carl Armbruster delivered a lecture at the London Institute, on Dec. 17th, on "Richard Wagner and his Works," with vocal and instrumental illustrations. The audience was large, and the close attention with which the lecturer was followed, broken only by frequent applause, showed how deep was the interest taken in the subject of the lecture. Mr. Armbruster played, with exceptional ability, several excerpts from Wagner's works on the piano, and had the valuable co-operation of Miss Friedlander, Mr. Ritter, and Mr. Thorndike in the rendering of the vocal illustrations.

The Morning Post of Dec. 18th has a long account of Mr. J. Brinsmead and Son's recent improvements in pianoforte building, in the direction of better action, increased strength, and consequent greater power of keeping in tune, and improved internal arrangements by which increased length of string and larger sonority are obtained.

The Horley Choral Society appear to have been successful in their application to the Brighton Railway Company for the stopping of a late train for the convenience of Redhill members. The society gave their sixth concert, under the direction of their conductor, Mr. W. E. Bartlett, on Dec. 18th, when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Spohr's "God, Thou art great," were performed.

A good local concert in aid of the funds of the Royal United Hospital was given at 3, Lansdown Crescent, Bath, on Dec. 18th. Miss Agnes Ellaby, Miss Ada Morris, Miss E. Fowkes, Miss C. Evans, Signor Pieraccini, Mr. Harris, Herr Ehnke, and others took part in the performance, and gave proof that Bath is rich in the possession of good executive artists.

On Tuesday, Dec. 18th, a number of valuable musical instruments including pianofortes, harmoniums, Cremona violins, violas, and violoncellos, including a very choice violin by Stradiuarius, purchased by Viotti for his friend, Mr. Hankey, together with wind instruments, a few valuable copyrights, and a quantity of miscellaneous music, were sold by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.

The music halls intend to bid vigorously for holiday custom. Says a contemporary:—Mr. Jennings has issued an interesting and gigantic programme for the due celebration of the Christmas holidays at the Oxford Music Hall; while Mr. Purkess promises the début of a real live Princess at the Royal, in the person of Princess Pignatelli, who has created quite a sensation at La Scala, Paris. This noble lady, with three little children, has been cruelly deserted by her husband, and though her sisters are fabulously rich, she has been compelled to sing for her living.

On Dec. 13th, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby gave an excellent concert, sustained chiefly by the pupils of her vocal academy, at Steinway Hall. Several of the young lady students proved by their performances the value of the instruction imparted at the institution under the charge of the distinguished lady artist and teacher. A select chorus of female voices and some clever violin playing by Miss W. Robinson (of the Royal Academy of Music), formed good contrasts to the performances of the solo vocalists. M. Sainton conducted, and Mr. H. Leipold presided at the pianoforte.

At a reception held by Dr. and Mrs. Harper, at their residence in Addison Road, last Saturday afternoon, some good music was heard by the guests. Mdme. Viard-Louis played classical pieces in her usual style of excellence, and a violinist, M. Henkel, introduced a solo by Henri Wieniawski. Mr. F. Quatremayne scored a point by singing what is now an interesting piece, namely, the introductory romance from Verdi's early opera "Simon Boccanegra" in F sharp minor, "Il lacerato spirito," recently restored by the composer, with extra parts for performance at the new Italian Opéra in Paris. Mr. Quatremayne took low F sharp at the close and quite excited his audience. An amateur, Miss Johnston, well read in the texts of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, accompanied the vocal numbers, and herself played with éclat.

Says Figaro anent the score of Berlioz's "Requiem":—To analyse or criticise so extraordinary a score would be impossible in a newspaper, and indeed it was found impracticable in the ordinary Crystal Palace programme-book. Otherwise a pertinent enquiry might be allowed why the call to the Resurrection, the prayer for pity to the tremendous King of Majesty, and the pathetic "Lachrymosa" should be accompanied by the hideous noise of trombones and ophicleides, of ten able-bodied men thwacking at kettle-drums, of tubas and cornets, of double drums, cymbals, and tam-tams. The tam-tam is not usually considered a celestial instrument, and the din, which caused music lovers with delicate oral apparatus to close their ears on Saturday, could not well have been greater if Berlioz had been trying to describe the casting out of that old serpent which deceiveth the whole world, and if the ancient reptile were energetically protesting against his punishment. In truth it may be added, Berlioz had realised the dramatic rather than the religious character of the words.

Weber's "Sylvana."—This was the sixth of his dramatic works, and, after many disappointments, was produced at Frankfort, September 16th, 1810. An interesting account may be found in the first volume of the "Life of Weber," by his son, Baron Max von Weber (English translation by J. Palgrave Simpson, Chapman and Hall).—S. S. S.

Music for Choir.—"An Old Subscriber" may perhaps find something to suit him in the "Sunday Part-Songs" of W. H. Cummings, published in The Choir, by Metzler and Co. I think that Boosey and Co., published some sacred part-songs, by F. H. Cowen, and the Musical Times contains many pieces fairly corresponding to that description.—S. S. S.

THE

NATURAL LAWS OF "EXPRESSION" IN MUSICAL EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL DELIVERY, AND THEIR SYSTEMATICAL APPLICATION.*

By Eustace J. Breakespeare.

II.

It is well understood that in all debated questions settlement is hopeless, unless there is a perfect agreement upon the exact application of the leading terms employed. From a confusion of ideas brought about by misapplication or imprecision of terms, many wrong-headed notions (as I account them) are still clinging to educated musicians (not to speak of amateurs), which might possibly be dissipated if it could be made apparent that the quarrel after all attaches to a word, rather than to a High-Art principle. Such a ground for dispute is opened by the assertion, so very frequently made, that where the proper feeling is resident, the expression is certain to be easy, natural, and good. Does it occur to those who make so much use of the word "expression"—its indispensability to truly musical performance and so on—that the word is not so definite in its meaning as ought to be one so commonly used; that what A means by "expression" in his playing is something which B would refuse to admit as that quality? To tell anyone to sing or play with expression—assuming ability in the performer to produce the thing required at simple will—is none the less absurd for its being such a familiar ordinance. It is forgotten the immense distance between emotional susceptibility, "feeling" (or whatever we may please to term it), and artistic exposition. The want of distinction between what I will term naïve expression and artistic expression is the great source of misunderstanding upon this subject. By "naïve expression"—to make my own terms as clear as I possibly can,—I mean that untutored, simple, artless delivery, without any recognition of the fictive element in the expositional part of Art. You meet with those not only holding that this is the most to be admired, but who would denounce any other expression as artificial, formal, and false. If these were correct, then that expression would logically be the best in which the performer was most under the sway or dominancy of some determinate passion or sentiment. But we know as a matter of fact that no singer is actually impelled or dominated by feelings of jealousy, hatred, despair. However much his subject takes hold upon him, the artist always preserves his consciousness of the fictional character of the emotion expressed, so long as he is an artist. Even if it were otherwise (apart from the question whether the reality of his emotion could in any way insure the correctness of his expression), such a thing would simply not be Art, whatever it were.

The amateur's feeling is no doubt perfectly genuine; but the question is, not so much as to the truth or importance of the feeling in itself, as to whether its naïve expression is sufficient to it. Then we have to consider the expression as it is brought to bear upon the reproduction of others' creations. It is a different thing altogether with the direct unburdening of our own emotions, and the representation of feelings already expressed in some form by others. It is a question how far—even with respect to the simple delivery of a ballad tune—the performance, in so far as it is reproduction, can be said to be perfectly naïve; but not to make too many nice distinctions of this sort, and assuming the player or singer delivers the work as if it were actually his own spontaneous production, how far does this expression accord with that intended by the first originator? It may differ entirely from the latter; some super-addition (hineinlegen, as the Germans term it) of the representant's subjectivity (especially with works of a certain "plastic" character) may distort the composer's meaning entirely. Thus, we have not only to consider how far the possession of the requisite emotional nature also finds its adequate means of expressing itself, but also to distinguish between the naïve expression of actual sentiment and the naïve expression, as far as may be, of already-fashioned productions.

On the other hand, by artistic expression, we are not necessarily to understand an artificial one devoid of all natural impulse; but properly one where the artist is fully self-conscious, and able to regulate the utterance of his sentiment by a clear appreciation of all the media of expression. Music is a language in which the nature of the ideas expressed cannot be explained by words, but where the medium of expression permits of being viewed and studied separately. The forms through which the "Inhalt" or subject-matter of music is expressed, are not, like the latter, of such mysterious nature, not allowing of analysis. Just as in language, the elocutionary part is distinct from the ideas expressed. I have heard it said that if a man knows his own mind, or has a clear idea therein, his expression, however rude his oratory, will yet be good. This is, of course, corresponding to what I have been saying with respect to naïve musical expression. I am not so much concerned with the question of its goodness, as with making clear the distinction that it is in this expository, rhetorical, or elocutionary part that the artistry of the performance resides; and just what the rude orator misses (apart from the question of the genuineness of his sentiments or the simple adequacy of their expression) is alike what is wanting to the naïve performer in music.

Let it not be thought that I am advocating some artificial overlay upon the natural feeling. I wish only to make understood that the artistic element consists largely in the clear recognition and deliberate adaptation of the various means of expression to their end; and that this artistic part is much more than is generally recognised—I suspect from some fear of possibly lowering the ideal dignity of Art—much more under the ruling of the purely intellectual faculties. This view does not, I need perhaps hardly say, open itself to any inference that the mere elocutionary or rhetorical qualities would alone be sufficient to a musical performance. The objection raised by Mr. Stephens, on the reading of Mr. Curwen's paper, that you might observe every mark in a piece of music and yet not be said to play with expression (the word used in a particular sense), will not run counter to what I have said. In Lussy's sense, you might be said to play with expression if your playing, in its recognition of nuances, followed ordinary usages. To any such interpretation as this of the word "expression," Mr. Stephens's objection would, I consider, be fatal. While maintaining that naïve expression is uncertain and variable, to say the least (not to consider the point I have raised as to the player's subjectivity interfering with the composer—if not false to its own nature, it may not be that intended by the author of the work), there is need to adopt the opposite extreme of artificiality. But very often, what some take to be "expression," is this artificiality. If, as I have remarked before, a teacher calls upon his pupil to play "with expression" the result is some ridiculous, nauseating, vulgar, "make-believe"—some imitation of forms of delivery which conventionally is understood as "expression." We have all made the acquaintance of the sentimental vocalist. But then, again, if this is not the expression, neither is it the artistry I mean. To say that all good musicians obey the natural laws of expression, by virtue of their musical faculty, does not do away with the desirability for some inquiry into this province of musical art. You may say, why should a thing naturally done be any the better for reflection thereupon? Apart from the fact that if this doubt obtained, all literary—not necessarily philosophic—concernment with art could have no raison d'être; it is not so certain that minds, even those specifically musical, are able by virtue of their feeling to command all the media of art. It is the same with poetical sentiment. We may have ever so much understanding of, and sympathy with, a Shakespearean character, but should we thereby think ourselves justified in engaging to represent the character upon the stage or even to recite the part? Just as in the actor's business, the expository element in music demands separate education. Owing to some misunderstanding of this kind, it has been feared that any such education was intended as a substitute for the musicianly nature itself. I will not say how far Lussy's method would help to confirm this error. The theory of the self-unconsciousness of the musician, I am aware, obtains very widely—of his singing "wie der Vogel singt, der in den Zweigen wohnet"; and if it is clearly shown that that performance is best in which the artist has least reviewed his materials, I must, of course, give in. A similar opinion is that which holds that the best music after all is the people's music—the best songs, the simple old ballads. This is a very favourite theorem with amateurs. Art takes root in the life-giving emotion, but to say that its genius is impaired when it becomes self-reflective or when the expressional media are deliberated, is to have no understanding of the distinction between Art and Nature, and to take away its position among the intellectual forces. The expression, as I understand it, is the form which the feeling takes; if one is never taught to reflect upon the means of expression at their command, they cannot strictly be said to deliver themselves expressively. I claim that any views I advance are the results of practical conversance with the art, and not formulated like the German philosopher's camel. At the same time I have remarked that the theories of many musicians are curiously at variance with their practice. Some time ago I was reminded of the fact, that the general tendency is not to return upon the sources of our pleasures. But no truth is affected by any reference to things as they commonly exist; else it would be reasonless to attempt to institute such a thing as moral law, since we know very well most men's actions are determined without reference to ethics. Beyond the direct pleasures of Art, there is a new element of pleasure afforded in the conscious observation and control of our feelings, and the careful estimation and control of the effects required in practical Art. To say that the possession of this faculty is not general does not argue against its desirability or even necessity. It is at any rate the mark of distinction between the artist (properly so called) and the naïve amateur.

THE VOICE

MUSICALLY AND MEDICALLY CONSIDERED.

BY

ARMAND SEMPLE, B.A., M.B., Cantab., M.R.C.P., Lond.
Physician to the Royal Society of Musicians.

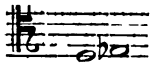
CULTIVATION OF THE MALE VOICE.

The preceding remarks are equally applicable to male and female voices, but in the former the following points must, in addition, be borne in mind.

The CHEST VOICE of the Bass should be attacked about Si (B) or Do (C)

That of the Tenor at Re (D), or Mi (E) flat



In Basses the tones Fa (F), Fa (F) sharp, Sol (G), Sol (G) sharp, and La (A) and in Tenors, the tones Sol (G), Sol (G) sharp, La (A), and La (A) sharp present a peculiar and interesting phenomenon. Without great care, these sounds are very difficult to produce with a clear ringing quality, since the larynx always has a tendency to render them muffled and sombre, and thus they are a source of annoyance to the singer. To overcome this tendency, and render the voice firm, the only method is to emit the Italian A, E or I (Anglicè Ah, A, E) in the clear timbre, with more and more openness. The Bass singer at La (A) flat and the Tenor at Si (B), or Do (C) should begin gently to "round" or "cover" the voice; for at these points in the respective voices the actual clear quality would be too thin. The word "rounding," not closing, is here used advisedly: closing the voice is accomplished by the employment of the Italian I, but rounding is performed by slightly arching the soft palate. This proceeding applies to the sounds Si (B), Do (C), and Do (C) sharp or at and from the Re (D), following, the two qualities agree. In this part of the vocal scale the bright timbre is the most difficult to attain, and it should therefore be thoroughly overcome at this point by careful practice before the closed timbre is employed in these sounds, otherwise the voice may become permanently muffled or veiled.

(To be continued.)

"Hero and Leander" is the title of the new cantata composed by Mr. Harford Lloyd, and accepted by the Worcester Festival Committee for next year's performance.

Miss Santley.

Fragments of Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello ..... Mendelssohn.
Mdme. Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Holländer, and Piatti.

Accompanist - - - Signor Romili.

Beethoven's Septet invariably attracts a larger and more appreciative audience than any other work of his, or perhaps than any work of any writer. By an odd coincidence, the same andante with variations and scherzo, fragments of Mendelssohn's unfinished quartet, were included in the programme last season when the septet was given. The performance of both works left nothing to be desired.

As was to be expected, neither of the solo instrumentalists escaped the customary encore. Miss Santley's selection was very interesting. Dr. Stanford's lullaby calls for the most subdued and careful accompaniment; an ordinary, monotonous reading of the peculiar discordant harmonies would be fatal. Signor Romili, however, again proved beyond question his perfect appreciation of what is fittest. The two songs by English ladies are of far more than average merit. In both the spirit of the poems (by Burns and Tennyson respectively) has been happily caught, and no higher praise than this could be given.

Those who are thoroughly acquainted with M. de Pachmann's playing and with Schumann's Carnival scenes, will probably be unanimously of opinion that the favourite pianist was not at his best on Saturday last. At his recital a fortnight earlier, the rendering of these "Scènes Mignonnes" were, with a Chopin ballade, what dwelt on the mind of the hearer as having been most unconventional, most perfect, most inspired. But the performance on Saturday was far from perfect; several inaccuracies occurred, most noticeably in "Coquette" and the "Promenade," but a machine alone is always alike satisfactory, and there is nothing mechanical about M. de Pachmann. At his second recital, three days before, he was not in his most perfect and genial form, and he seemed in haste to bring the performance to a close. His cutting short, on that occasion, of Liszt's "Bénédiction de Dieu" (playing only the first movement), must have been a great disappointment to all those anxious to compare his reading with that of our own pianist and Liszt-interpreter, Mr. Walter Bache.

A peculiarity, however, in his reading of Arlequin in the "Carnaval" was conspicuous at both performances—a peculiarity that involves a scarcely warrantable liberty on the part of any pianist, as it is nothing less than changing the time, accent, and phrasing of the entire movement. He played it throughout on both occasions in 4-4 instead of 3-4 time, making two bars into one, and playing the first two notes of the 2nd, 4th, and every alternate bar as quavers instead of crotchets. In the middle portion of the movement he was obliged to shorten his dotted crotchet and quaver by one half in each bar and play two bars as one in order to keep up his 4-4 time. It is a question if such changes are within the rights of even the most splendid and accomplished of executants.

Our programme writer is not usually happy in his remarks on Schumann's music. I have before called attention to the absurd observation that the "'Carnaval' was begun in 1834 and finished in 1835, whereas Beethoven or Mendelssohn would have done with it in a couple of days," as if we had proof that Schumann was working away at it assiduously the whole time, instead of having, quite accidentally, direct proof to the contrary. Besides this remarkable criticism as to the time it took to compose, we have equally remarkable contradictions as to its essence. First we read, "A brief citation from each of the many themes of which it is made up will answer all purposes," and immediately after the "citations," the puzzled student is told that "the 'Carnaval' is neither more or less than a theme with variations in different measures." Which is it? It cannot be both, any more than it could have taken Schumann a year of actual work to compose.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second concert of this venerable society on Wednesday, Dec. 19, was appropriately devoted to "The Messiah." St. James's Hall was filled with an attentive and appreciative audience, and Mr. Chas. Hallé conducted the performance. The solo principals were Miss Anna Williams, Mdme. Enriquez, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. F. King. The grand "Christmas" Chorus in G evoked tremendous applause, but no encores were accepted. Miss Williams sang very well. The reading of the air in E flat, "He was despised," by Mdme. Enriquez, was thought to be wanting in pathos, and in one passage an introduced ("extra") note hardly improved Handel's text! Mr. Harper Kearton excelled in the tenor airs, and Mr. F. King, in "Why do the nations," scored a good point. This bass air, which Henry Phillips so nobly sang some 40 years ago, always makes one deep impression in the "Messiah." A. M.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

During the Christmas-tree festival of this institution, which was held on the 21st, at the College, Westow Street, Upper Norwood, there was a display of the musical talent of the pupils; and the concert, including as it did, Bach's Choral in A minor, Madrigals from Gibbons and Morley; a chorus from Sir G. Macfarren's "King David," and the sacred cantata by Berlioz, "The Flight into Egypt," reflected the highest credit on the training of the pupils. Viscountess Folkestone had kindly promised to sing for the pupils; but, to their disappointment and sympathetic sorrow, her ladyship was prevented from attending by a domestic bereavement. By special request Miss Cousin, one of the pupils, and the choir, sang, in lieu of one of Lady Folkestone's songs, "Weel may the keel row," the last verse of which had to be repeated in response to a hearty encore. After Mrs. Richardson-Gardner had unveiled the Christmas-tree, Dr. Campbell, the Principal of the College, expressed to her the thanks of the pupils, and intimated that in pursuance of a suggestion by Mr. Richardson-Gardner, M.P., a provincial tour would be undertaken by some of the scholars next year, when it was hoped that the work of the institution would thus become better known throughout the kingdom.

MR. F. VON ZASTROW'S DRAWING-ROOM CONCERTS.

At the first concert, early in December, Gade's Duet Sonata for pianoforte and violin, was well played by Messrs. Bond-Andrews and Polonaski; Mr. Bond-Andrews produced some of his own pretty pieces for the keyed instrument.—At the matinée of Dec. 15, Mr. Hargrave played pianoforte solos by Rheinberger, Chopin, Raff; and Mr. Bond-Andrews the "Spinning Song." Mr. Faulkner (tenor), and Mr. Grime (bass), sang effectively. Mdme. Florence Grant and Miss Lilian Curtis also appeared.

TIVERTON.

The first concert of the tenth season of the Musical Society, which took place on Dec. 13th, at Heathcote Hall, has shown that the taste for high-class music amongst the inhabitants of Tiverton and the district is in no way on the wane. During the Society's existence many of the great works of well-known composers have been placed before the public with success. At the concert on Thursday evening, the programme was made up of Mozart's "Requiem" Mass, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." In former seasons, one such work was considered sufficient to tax the powers of the members; but, advancing years has evidently increased the confidence of the leaders in the efficiency of the choir and orchestra under their charge. Notwithstanding the inclement weather, the hall was well filled, nearly all the reserved seats, 200, being occupied by the leading families of the neighbourhood. The chorus consisted of 60 voices, and was aided as soloists by Madame Bellamy, Mrs. Rogers Bate, Miss Melhuish, Mr. Ferris Tozer, Mr. J. Hutchings. The band consisted of some 35 players; and, on the whole, did their work satisfactorily. The chorus was also good; the sopranos giving their high notes with much point and clearness. Of the two works, the "Hymn of Praise" was the best performed, all things considered. The symphony of this work was really excellently rendered. Great credit is due to the conductor, Mr. T. Russe, for his successful labours as a leader of the Society.

SPOHR'S "LAST JUDGMENT" AT ST. MARGARET PATTENS, E.C.

This Advent three City churches have given a performance of this oratorio, so admirably suited in its sentiment to illustrate one of the chief lessons of the season. Those who heard the oratorio were most favourably impressed, especially as the church possesses the perfection of an auditorium, both in respect of form and resonant qualities. St. Margaret's has an excellent choir, under the training and direction of Mr. Stedman. This was strengthened to a chorus of about fifty, the only addition to the leading voices of the church being Mr. Fryer, of St. Paul's Cathedral, as principal tenor, with whom was associated Mr. Price, Mr. Hutchinson taking the bass solos; Masters Townsend and Hull, the treble; and Master Walenn the alto. Mr. Stedman, of course, conducted, thus supplementing with excellent command and precision his labour in preparation. He was well and successfully aided by Mr. W. Stark, who had no light task, with a trying accompaniment, on an organ, which, though sweet in tone, was by no means planned as a substitute for an orchestra. All the numbers of the work were carefully given, the body and quality of tone being remarkably good, as were the precision of attack in the choruses, and the attention to light and shade. The most impressive effect, perhaps, was produced by the duet, "Forsake me not," and the quartet and chorus, "Blest are the departed." It is intended to perform a new oratorio next Lent.

BIRMINGHAM.

The concert given at the Midland Institute, on the 1st inst., was more than usually interesting. The choir, formed a little time ago, under Mr. Stockley's direction, for the study and practice of the old English madrigals and part songs, made its first public appearance. The pieces selected were, John Wilbye's madrigal, "Flora gave me fairest flowers"; Thos. Morley's so-called ballet, "Now is the month of maying"; John Dowland's "Awake, sweet love"; Festa's "Down in a flow'ry vale"; Weelkes's madrigal, "In pride of may"; and Benedict's part-song, "The Wreath." Mr. Stockley has had good material to work with, (his choir numbering many of the very best amateur vocalists of the town), and it goes without saying that, under his ictus, every attention was given to the light and shade, making up so much of the charm of these historical little gems. It is strange that little or nothing has for years and years been done toward the cultivation, in the town, of this interesting and most neglected class of English art. We have really only one glee party, and that with a limited repertoire, and whose members, are, in their several ways, "not what they once were." Breaking the succession of the choral items came two pianoforte solos, rendered by Miss Agnes Miller,—Schumann's "Faschungschwank," and a selection from the harpsichord studies of Scarlatti. In both performances Miss Miller was highly successful. Scarlatti's glittering passages (how modern they seem, too!) are well adapted to display the crisp touch and faultless precision of Miss Miller's playing. In Schumann's work the pianist seemed to flag a little toward the close; the hurly-burly of the final scene of the Carnival requiring a masculine vigour and an untired wrist.

At Mr. Stockley's orchestral concert, on the 18th of the month, the following was the programme offered:—

Overture, "Stradella"	Flotow.
"Creation's Hymn"	Beethoven.
"Voi che sapete"	Mozart.
Intermezzo Moresque	Elgar.
"O dlamour messagiera" ("Mireille")	Gounod.
Pianoforte Concerto in C minor	Beethoven.
Symphony, "The Eroica"	"
"Sleep, my love, sleep"	Sullivan.
Pianoforte Polonaise in F sharp minor	Chopin.
"Spinning"	Cowen.
"Beware"	Moulton.
Overture, "Semiramide"	Rossini.

The "Eroica" Symphony was performed in splendid style. Mr. Stockley's orchestra is now fully able to assert its claims to a position among the finest provincial societies of its kind, few as they are. Of London I had better not speak. The technical slips in the performance of Beethoven's grand martial epic were few and unimportant; the "reading" of the work was absolutely faultless. No higher treat has been for very long afforded us than that given in this most worthy performance. The "Eroica" has not been heard in its entirety for many years, in Birmingham. The piano concerto was a grand achievement of Miss Miller's; every note of the work seemed to have been most carefully studied, in the higher æsthetical as well as the practical sense. In Chopin, however, I cannot but think she is a little out of her element. Not that it was anything but a fine, musicianly performance; but the fair pianist's style is somewhat too reserved, I may say a little cold; as a representant of works belonging to the grand classic school she is undoubtedly without reproach; in those of the romantic school there is something a little wanting yet. The Intermezzo Moresque is by one of the members of Mr. Stockley's band, a young violinist of Worcester. It is rather inaptly styled, there being nothing Moorish about it, a few ad captandum effects with cymbals, being excepted and excused. The piece is constructed of some very pleasing and graceful, if not very original themes, and the instrumentation is decidedly ingenious. Mr. Elgar may well be congratulated on the success of his first essay. Miss Samuell seems to improve with every song she sings. In Mozart's charming, never-to-be-hackneyed aria she was very fine; the over-loudness of the accompaniment (orchestral), alone prevents me saying that the song "was heard to perfection." This is the only defect still to remedy in the orchestra. In Cowen's song (with Dr. Winn's judicious help at the piano) she was again highly successful. The other songs were well rendered by Miss Helen d'Alton (a substitute, and a worthy one, for Signor Foli, who disappointed Mr. Stockley at the last moment). Although I say it with fear and trembling, I do not greatly admire "Creation's Hymn"; still less in its transposed form. In Sullivan's and Moulton's well-known strains she pleased much better. At the next concert (Feb. 7th), Schumann's Symphony in B flat is to be produced, along with Svendsen's Norwegian Rhapsody.

Mr. Stratton's Chamber Concert, given on the 11th, abounded as usual, in novelties. The director himself came forward as pianist, with some agreeable little specimens by a new Italian writer, who seems to be making his mark—Giovanni Rinaldi. Like a good deal of the modern Italian music, Rinaldi's style seems to have been very much influenced by German models—Schumann in particular. Still, in Rinaldi there is much originality, and the true Italian character of melody. Mr. Stratton selected three pieces from a collection published by Breitkopf, ("Reflets et Paysages")—"Nel Giardino," "Lungo il viale," and "Al Torneo." [Why works written by an Italian and published by a German house, should bear a French title, is more than I can say.] Beethoven's magnificent quartet, Op. 59, No. 3—one of the three "Rasoumowski" quartets—was performed here, under Mr. Ward's leadership, in a very worthy manner. Field's "Quintet," so called—properly a nocturne, was rendered remarkably well; it is one of Field's characteristically sweet things, just a little bit too much spun-out for some tastes. A MS. sonata, for piano and 'cello by Mr. Praeger was produced by way of novelty. Without making assumption to any higher insight than possessed by any other critic present, I certainly found much to admire in the work. The themes are interesting, indeed beautiful; and the way in which piano and 'cello are occupied in dialogue, so to speak, is remarkably ingenious. Mr. Praeger seems to have followed out the Wagnerian principle of the leit-motif—a certain theme running throughout the entire work, as a connecting link between the different movements. This is also a feature of the work to be admired; and I look upon the sonata as a forerunner of what will be possible in a future development of instrumental forms, as far as possible upon the Wagnerian principles of vocal melody. A performance followed of Raff's Octet in C (for strings), one of the most genial works of this writer. The style of the last movement is, perhaps, a little too boisterous, but throughout the work there is a continuous stream of beautiful ideas, both harmonic and melodic. This work was performed excellently and received enthusiastically.

I can only mention in a line the performance of Mr. Cowen's "St. Ursula," which was given by the Festival Choral Society, on the 29th ult. Even if I had more space at command I regret to say I was unable to be present, so my comments could only be made at secondhand. The performance, I am told, was a very good one; the work fully sustaining Mr. Cowen's reputation, though rather unequal in interest, some parts being comparatively tame, others reaching a high dramatic pitch—the music throughout highly pleasing and effective. Mr. Cowen seems to have satisfied these ordinary expectations, if he has done nothing beyond.

A very interesting amateur concert (under Mr. Dutton's direction) given for the benefit of the Birmingham Dental Hospital, took place at the Midland Institute last week. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," a movement of Beethoven's B flat Symphony, the overtures to Molique's "Abraham" and Auber's "Haydée," and a pleasing selection of songs, made up the programme. Considered as an amateur affair the performances of band (in which several ladies took part), chorus, and soloists were surprisingly good.

A few remarks I have to make respecting the musical doings at the "Clef Club" I must withhold till next time.

A new musical society is in process of formation, with a constitution and aims similar to those of the Musical Association (London). Some time ago it was suggested that this society should institute provincial branches: but no practical steps were taken. In certain societies already existing the lay element is too largely felt. It is time the musical profession in Birmingham had a Musical Association of its own. BR.

The death is announced of M. Auguste Offenbach, son of the late well-known composer. M. Offenbach, who died at Nice, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, inherited a considerable share of his father's talent.

Mr. John C. Ward, on the occasion of his retirement from the organistship of Quebec Chapel, has been presented with a testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver "Queen Anne" kettle and a purse of money. The kettle bears the following inscription:—"Presented to John C. Ward Esq., in grateful remembrance of fifteen years' faithful and kindly work in connection with Quebec Chapel and district, and the Hampden Gurney Schools,"

EDINBURGH.

The fifth annual "Social," under the auspices of the Students' Club, was held in the Waterloo Rooms on Dec. 18th—Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley presiding. The large hall was crowded. The chairman opened the proceedings with an address, making special reference to the Students' Orchestra, which has been organised. This orchestra, numbering about thirty performers, began the programme with the overture "La Dame Blanche," by Boïeldieu, showing wonderful efficiency. Their subsequent pieces were Haydn's symphony (No. 2), and Mozart's overture "Le Nozze di Figaro;" while several solo pieces were also creditably played by individual members. The part-song choir, too, sang, very tastefully, such pieces as "The Arrow and the Song," and "The Norse Queen's Gift," both by Walter Hay; and "The Red Cross Knight," by Callcott. Several of the young gentlemen made quite a mark as vocalists—Mr. George de B. Watson, who possesses a fine tenor voice, gaining a deserved encore for Sir Herbert Oakeley's song, "Tyrant Love," the composer playing the pianoforte accompaniment. Mr. Reginald E. Horsley gave a highly dramatic delivery of the interesting classical story, "Clytemnestra." Mr. Dambmann was conductor of the music.

The formation of orchestras in connection with our colleges is a noteworthy movement; and Sir H. Oakeley is entitled to much praise for his labour in this direction. If our college students devoted themselves more to artistic studies and less to athletic sports, the world would gain; for our Universities would not only produce more intelligent—because more generally cultivated—scholars, but more real gentlemen; many parents, too, would be saved from the misery of having to support misguided youths who have grossly squandered away much time and money; and an influential class of intelligent art patrons would be formed.

LEEDS.

As soon as it was announced that the Committee of the Leeds Musical Festival, held last October, had declined the services of Madame Albani, Mr. Archibald Ramsden—with his usual enterprise—entered into an engagement with that lady to appear at his annual performance of the "Messiah;" an event which came off with the greatest success on Tuesday evening, Dec. 18. Lovers of music in Leeds have, indeed, reason to be grateful to Mr. Ramsden, for the rich treat afforded them on this occasion; and, judging from the crowded state of the Town Hall, the concert was as great a success, financially, as it was artistically. Madame Albani met with a reception which must have been most flattering; and, nothing could be more delightful or impressive than the manner in which she rendered the beautiful soprano music of the oratorio. Her singing of the recit. "There were Shepherds," and following airs, will not soon be forgotten by those present. And the chaste and devotional manner in which she gave the lovely air—"I know that my Redeemer liveth,"—was much admired. The contralto music was entrusted to Miss Hilda Wilson, who sang throughout with much feeling and expression. Mr. Barton McGuckin's fine voice was heard to advantage in the opening recit.—"Comfort ye,"—as well as in the whole of the tenor music. Mr. Bridson was very successful in his share of the oratorio music, his rendering of the airs "Behold, I tell you a mystery," and "The trumpet shall sound," being particularly fine. The choruses were taken in a manner that was highly satisfactory, and the members of the band did their work well. Mr. R. S. Burton made a thoroughly efficient conductor; and Mr. J. P. Bowling Atby presided at the organ. J. D. T.

SALISBURY.

On Dec. 20th, Spohr's sacred oratorio, "The Last Judgment," was given at the Cathedral. The music was excellently rendered, the first chorus, "Praise His awful name," and the quartet and chorus, "Blest are the Departed" being most effective. Mr. Hayden gave "And, lo! a throne was set in Heaven" with much expression and power. Mr. Marr and Mr. Crick efficiently took the alto and bass parts, and Salter did well in the treble. The Cathedral was well filled and the congregation showed the greatest reverence and attention, so that one may hope that the Dean will soon arrange for a repetition of what has proved a musical treat of a high order. Mr. South's playing was greatly admired. It is gratifying to note, indeed, that Mr. South who went to Salisbury an amateur organist without professional reputation, has already won the admiration of all by his artistic playing and by the manifest improvements he has brought about in the Cathedral music.

A "Saturday Evening Entertainment" at the "Welcome," with a good miscellaneous programme, arranged by Miss Harriette Morgan, was given on December 15, in aid of the Norwood Cottage Hospital.

It seems now unlikely that German opera will be given in London next season,

CIRENCESTER.

On Thursday evening, Dec. 6th, the parish church was filled by an immense congregation, the occasion being the holding of a special Advent service, the principal characteristic of which was the singing of Spohr's beautiful oratorio of "The Last Judgment," with full orchestral accompaniment. The project has been under consideration for some time, and it was not without much thoughtful deliberation that the Ven. Archdeacon Hayward decided on taking advantage of the magnificent proportions of the church, and the facilities afforded by the existence and attainments of the Cirencester Choral Society to hold a service specially appropriate to the season, and to introduce into it as its chief feature the performance of an oratorio so eloquent, both in its words and music, of teaching suitable to Advent-tide. During the interval before the service opened, Mr. Ralph Norris, organist of Holy Trinity Church, skilfully played a number of voluntaries. The service opened with the well-known Advent hymn, "Lo! He comes in clouds descending," sung to the tune Helmsley, with orchestral accompaniment by the band.

The Ven. Archdeacon Hayward delivered an address from Psalm lxxxv. 8, "I will hearken what the Lord God will say concerning me, for He shall speak peace unto His people and to His saints, that they turn not again." The Archdeacon said: The question is often raised whether the music in our churches ought to be purely congregational—only of such a kind and character that the assembled worshipers can join in it, or whether it is legitimate and desirable that some of it should be performed for them, so that they may be edified by simply listening to it. Looking at the strides which music has made, we shall not be far wrong in saying that, like its elder sister arts of Architecture and Painting, it is emphatically a product of Christianity. The point from which all music starts is within us. Its progress is the development of a gift originally planted within us. Christianity has stirred this gift directly and indirectly. It has excited the imagination and kindled the enthusiasm, and may not we say the inspiration, of gifted men known to us as our great composers. Their works move and stir those feelings which colour our lives, inspire our words, and nerve us for all our actions. We believe that these oratorios with which Christ's Church is now enriched are one out of God's many voices to us; one of the many ways he would have employed to bring home to us His eternal truths. We believe that these finished compositions—the offspring of so many prayers—of so many hours of rapt meditation (it is said of Haydn that when he began to write one of his oratorios he wrote on the top of his first sheet of paper before he put a note upon it, "Glory to God," and when he concluded it he put at the end of the manuscript, "Thanks be to God") come to us laden with a divine message to our souls, as true, if not as universally telling, as the message of the preacher. No doubt there are dangers attending their performance. They may captivate the fancy and not reach the mind—they may please the taste and not touch the conscience. But what good thing is there that may not be abused? We have done all we can do in pointing to the dangers. We have tried to guard you from it by prefacing this oratorio with a special service of prayer. The rest is in your hands—all I would say in deep earnestness is—"He that hath ears to hear let him hear." The words of the oratorio speak for themselves. You have them now before you."

At the conclusion of the address, the oratorio was sung. The principals were Miss Mary Beare, Miss Lizzie Hellis, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Thomas Brandon. The whole was under the able bâton of Mr. Edward Brind, choirmaster and organist of the parish church and conductor of the Choral Society, and on whom the manner in which the oratorio was rendered reflects the highest credit. The work was interpreted most admirably throughout, with the greatest taste and feeling, and the style of its performance evidenced much painstaking study in its preparation. The choruses were most satisfactorily sustained, being sung with marked precision. The band accompaniments were most successful, and the beautiful orchestral effects, for instance, in the quartet and chorus, "Lord God of heaven and earth," were exceedingly well illustrated. While the offertory was taken, Luther's hymn, "Great God, what do I see and hear," was sung with band accompaniment, which was introduced with remarkable success, the trombones taking up the last verse in unison with fine effect. The orchestral parts for the hymns were arranged by Mr. Brind.

CAMBERWELL.—The Christmas Entertainment of the Mary Datchelor School, Camberwell, was given on the 20th. Dramatic selections from Classical English and French plays were given. The musical performances were as follow:—Pianoforte solos by Misses May Barnes, Lizzie Laud, Kate Keeble, Clara Goodlatte, Grace Henshaw, Hannah Easton, Lillie Lloyd, and Jane Calder; a pianoforte concerto, Miss Fitch, R.A.M., superintendent of music, accompanied by Miss Llewellyn, L.R.A.M.; a violin solo, Miss Marie Schumann; and a song, "There is a green hill far away," Miss Cox, professor of singing at the Mary Datchelor School and at the Guildhall School of Music. There were also several part-songs, sung by a choir selected from pupils of the school. Miss Kimpton was the accompanist.

CORK.

The opening concert for this season of the Cork Musical Society was held in the Assembly Rooms on Wednesday evening, the 12th inst. The first part of the concert was entirely devoted to "The Holy City," by A. R. Gaul, Mus.Bac., the first time of its production in Ireland. Of its merits, as a composition, I shall not speak here; it was duly commented on in the Musical Standard at the time of its production at the late Birmingham Festival. Suffice it for me to say, that the choruses form the best portion of the work; the solos, with the exception of the first bass solo in the second part, being very tame. The instrumental prelude, though bringing to mind the introduction to "Lohengrin," is one of the best numbers, the instrumentation, though simple, adding greatly to the effect. In the performance, the sopranos were exceedingly good, their intonation and attack being remarkable; but they were too strong for the other voices. The basses and tenors were not alone weak, but bad; they sang the music fairly, but that was all. The chorus, "They that sow in tears," was about the best rendered. The solo singers calling for notice were—Miss Davidson (contralto), and Mr. Sullivan (bass); both singing their parts with great taste and expression. Miss Day and Mrs. Layfield also are deserving of some notice, but the others were very bad; some of them could not possibly be worse. The orchestra was very fair. The second part of the concert was opened with S. Clark's Grand March, "Flambeaux," interesting on account of the addition of five ladies to the strings of the orchestra. This is worth noticing on account of the change in public opinion: some time ago no lady would possibly countenance the appearance of ladies in the orchestra; but now, it appears to be becoming a fashion. The audience, being by this time in thoroughly good humour, encored nearly everything from this to the end of the programme that would admit of an encore. Now followed a recitative and song. "Oh, would I were a village girl,"—from Randegger's "Rival Beauties,"—sung with great effect by Miss Davidson, who possesses, in addition to natural musical ability, a splendid contralto voice, especially in the lower register. Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 9 (Pesther Carnival), was played in very good style by Miss Annie Atkins. The startling gradations of piano and forte which abound in Liszt's music being rendered con amore. Mr. Longfield next sang "It was a thorn," by the Viscountess Folkstone. Gounod's "Nazareth," (with instrumental accompaniment and chorus), sung by Mr. J. Sullivan, was decidedly the gem of the concert. "The Lark now leaves his watery nest" (Hatton) was sung, with much expression, by Dr. Burke. The chorus next gave Pinsuti's "The Sea hath its pearls," which was followed by a quartet and chorus, by the same composer, "Where wavelets rippled gently," the same being a choral setting of the "Blue Bells of Scotland." The less said about the singing of the soloists in this number the better. The concert concluded with "The Wine Cup is circling," for the entire body of voices.

F. St. John Lacey.

TAUNTON.

Recently a successful concert was given at the Independent College by the students, assisted by friends. The programme was carried out in a manner which reflected the highest credit upon the musical trainer of the students—Mr. T. J. Dudeney—who occupied the post of conductor. The Rev. F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc., addressed a few words to the students before the commencement of the concert. The opening piece, the overture, "Chevy Chase," a notable composition by G. A. Macfarren, was given in a very spirited manner by the orchestra. Mr. T. R. Glanvill, who was suffering from a bad cold, sang with expression the somewhat difficult song, "Estelle," by Henry Smart. This was followed by a pianoforte solo by A. Clements, who selected Macfarren's Sonata in A, one of the finest specimens of its class. The choristers sang "The Sea King," a part-song by Henry Smart, with great energy and a careful observance of light and shade. In the duet, "There be dreams which fade and perish," (Macfarren), the voices of T. R. Glanvill and R. Sommerville blended admirably, and the first part of the concert concluded with the beautiful part-song, "O Mistress Mine," by the same composer.

The second part commenced with the overture, "The May Queen," by W. Sterndale Bennett; and gave extreme pleasure. The part-song, "Hark, hark, the lark," another of Macfarren's compositions, is difficult, requiring great promptitude of attack and a close observance of light and shade to make it thoroughly effective. The rendering of it was, on the whole, satisfactory. A piece of considerable local interest was the old English ditty of "Near the Town of Taunton Dean," arranged by Mr. T. J. Dudeney. The melody is ancient, and the harmony by Mr. Dudeney is excellent. It was well sung. This was followed by the trios for soprano, tenor, and bass, "The Hawthorn in the Glade," from Sterndale Bennett's beautiful cantata, "The May Queen." A Mozart Symphony proved one of the most successful pieces of the evening, the concert concluding with "England," a part-song of a national character, by J. L. Hatton.

LIVERPOOL.

Spohr's oratorio the "Last Judgment" was rendered, on Dec. 19th, in St. Bridget's, Wavertree, by the body of vocalists which has become known as the "Banner" Choir. The church was crowded to its utmost capacity long before the service commenced, hundreds of applications for tickets having been refused. The many beauties of the work seemed to create a deep feeling, and by means of the string orchestra employed a splendid effect was obtained. Mr. W. A. Roberts most effectively interpreted the wind parts on the organ, especially in the stately overture and symphony, the latter of which foreshadows several of the subjects treated in the second part. Regarding the choir, the boys may be said to have carried off first honours for purity and power of tone. The soloists all acquitted themselves creditably. The majestic choruses "Praise His awful name," "Blessing and honour," and the dramatic "Destroyed is Babylon," were excellently sung. The recitatives were the least satisfactory features in the performance; and, in this particular, considerable difference existed between the full score and the band parts. Mr. S. Claude Ridley, who conducted, is to be congratulated, after weeks of careful training, upon the success which crowned his efforts.

BEDFORD.

The first series of "Musical Evenings" at Bedford came to an end on Friday, Dec. 14. The first soirée has been already noticed. The second was opened by Beethoven's Sonata in F, Op. 23. Mr. Bond-Andrews, the pianist, played, for solos, a prelude and fugue of J. S. Bach; Handel's Air and variations in E major; two from a set of his own, "Village Scenes," and Chopin's Polonaise in E flat. Herr Polonaski played several violin solos, to wit, a barcarolle of Spohr, Bach's Adagio on the G string; a fantasie of De Beriot; a ballade and polonaise of Vieuxtemps. The artist, as before, fully enlisted the sympathies of the audience. Mdme. Polonaski contributed vocal pieces, including her own setting of "How like a flower." At the 3rd concert, Grieg's sonata, called the "divine" (Gottliche) was finely interpreted by MM. Bond-Andrews and Polonaski. The former gentleman's treatment of Beethoven's funeral march, Sonata in A flat, attracted much attention as a careful and well-studied performance. A second series of concerts is projected next autumn.

Croydon.—A first-rate concert was given by the Literary and Scientific Institution Vocal Union, under the directions of Mr. Frederick Cambridge, on Dec. 13th, in the Public Hall, when there was a very good attendance. The first piece performed was Mr. J. Barnby's sacred cantata "Rebekah," the solo parts of which were taken by Mrs. Baker, Mr. T. L. Warner, and Mr. F. Bevan (Her Majesty's Chapel Royal). Unfortunately Mr. Warner was suffering from a severe cold, and so was not heard to advantage; but Mr. Bevan, who possesses a fine bass voice, gained considerable applause for his singing, both in this and the following piece. The second piece performed was Hofmann's "Melusina," and the solo parts were taken as follows:—"Melusina," Mrs. Manser; "Clotilda," Miss Kate Howard; "Count Raymond," Mr. F. Bevan; "Sintram," Mr. F. J. Thrift; and "The King of the Water Spirits," Mr. F. G. White. The choruses in both pieces were exceedingly well rendered, and reflected great credit on their conductor, Mr. Frederick Cambridge. Mr. Walmsley Little (Mus.Bac.) ably presided at the harmonium; and Mr. C. J. Wood admirably performed the duties of pianist.

Halstead, Essex.—On Dec. 11th a concert was given in the Town Hall, in aid of the funds of the Cottage Hospital. The concert had been arranged by the Halstead String Band, who were assisted by friends from Haverhill, Sudbury, Ipswich, Ardleigh, Colne Engaine, and Braintree, the orchestra comprising some thirty performers, among whom were a number of lady violinists. Mr. George Leake, A.C.O., wielded the bâton. There was a fairly large audience. The performance commenced with the overture, "Tancredi" (Rossini), which was played in excellent style. The band pieces also included the overture, "Zampa" (Hérold), and overture, "Semiramide" (Rossini), the last mentioned being undoubtedly the piece of the evening. The vocalists were Miss B. Horner, Mr. J. R. Vaizey, and Mr. L. Andrews. Mr. Pratt, of Ipswich, gave a violin solo in the first part, entitled "Reverie" (Vieuxtemps), and one in the second part, which was much more appreciated, a Fantasia on "Faust" (Alard). The flute solo, "Canzona" (Raft), was given by Mr. V. W. Taylor, and the encore which was awarded that gentleman, was well deserved. He responded by playing "Gigue" (Handel), and was equally successful. Mr. G. Leake was encored for an air with variations (Beethoven), and replied by playing "Lieder ohne Worte," No. 1.

An American paper has discovered that it requires some piano-forte-tude to hear some players practise a pianoforte etude two or three hours a day.

EUGENE D'ALBERT.

It may be of interest to give some particulars of the training and early career of this gifted young English musician, whose recent playing abroad has met with signal success. Eugene d'Albert is the youngest son of Mr. Charles d'Albert, an Englishman (of French extraction) residing at Newcastle-on-Tyne. In his youth, Mr. C. d'Albert was a dancer at the Italian Opera in London. There he probably imbibed a love of dance music, and appreciation for its marked rhythms, developing in later years into a happy facility for writing and arranging melodious music of this type, that has charmed a generation of the votaries of Terpsichore. Eugene was born at Newcastle, in the year 1863, Mr. T. Chappell, the well known London publisher, who issued most of his father's music, standing godfather to him. The boy's talent for the art was soon manifested, and to Mr. G. A. Osborne, among others, he was indebted for some early tuition.

In the year 1876 "The National Training School for Music," the pioneer of the now established Royal College of Music, was opened, the President being H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh. Among the pupils who commenced their career there, was young d'Albert. He was at that time but 13 years of age, and was elected to a free scholarship at the school, after a local competitive examination. The boy commenced his studies under the following eminent musicians:—Sir (then Mr.) Arthur Sullivan, the Principal of the new school, for Composition and Instrumentation; Harmony and Counterpoint, under Dr. J. Stainer; Pianoforte, Mr. E. Pauer; and, later on, Orchestration under Mr. E. Prout. The boy was most assiduous in his studies—once writing and scoring a complete Mass as a holiday task; his progress was so satisfactory, that, after a competitive examination among the pupils, he was elected to the "Queen's Scholarship," founded by Her Majesty. He enjoyed the advantages of this until he left the school in 1881. He was then, on the recommendation of Sir Arthur Sullivan, nominated to the "Mendelssohn Scholarship." This, the most valuable prize in the United Kingdom, was founded in London in the year 1848, by way of commemorating the great musician, whose death the world of music was then lamenting. Its object is to enable native musicians who have shown decided talent to continue their musical studies, either in England or abroad, forwarding to the Trustees, from time to time, fresh compositions. There is a stipend of about £90 per annum paid to the scholar. Young d'Albert held this post for some time. During the period of his studentship, he appeared in public at the grand concert given before the Prince and Princess of Wales in St. James's Hall, by the pupils of the National Training School, an overture by the youth for full orchestra being performed. Subsequently, he played at the Philharmonic Society's and Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts. On these occasions his marked abilities, both as composer and performer, were heartily recognized by the most highly cultured audiences that can be found; his clever pianoforte concerto, written, amongst other pieces, while in statu pupillari, meeting with deserved success.

After playing at the Richter Concerts, the well known conductor took Mr. d'Albert to Vienna, rather more than a year ago. Since that time, he has doubtless been increasing his knowledge and powers by contact with foreign musicians of eminence, from the sage of Weimar to the exponents of the newest school to be found in Berlin. One is glad to learn that the concerts he has given in the chief towns of Austria, Germany, and at St. Petersburgh have been uniformly successful, both artistically and financially; his reception by brother artists and able foreign critics having been cordial and appreciative. Mr. Eugene d'Albert is now but twenty years of age, and can hardly yet be said to have perfected his studies. There seems every prospect of his future career being bright, and one likely to afford conspicuous testimony as to the painstaking care with which his natural gifts were educed, and trained by his able masters at our National Training School for Music.

There is, say some American authorities, just a possibility that Herr Hans Richter will spend the next autumn and winter conducting concerts in Boston, U.S.

Mr. Hamilton Clarke's music to the "Merchant of Venice" used for Mr. Irving's representation of that play in New York has pleased American critics well able to recognise talent.

WORDS RETROSPECTIVE AND PROSPECTIVE.

ALTHOUGH an eminent writer has poetically striven to point out that time as measured out by man's own mechanical contrivances has been made into a means of self-torture, whereby man by turns often needlessly recalls and anticipates events which for the most part give rise to thoughts of pain and sadness; it is useless to deny that time measurements and especially the great yearly divisions afford valuable means of watching our human progress, forming new resolutions, alas! for the most part to be speedily broken, and gathering data for the formation of experience by comparison. So the editor, as he finds the old year waning away in the brief, dark wintry days and the new year about to peep out of the midnight gloom, bethinks himself of giving some account of his stewardship and offering some promises as to the future. With regard to the past nothing can here be done beyond the expression of personal gratitude for the esteemed and faithful labours of the contributors and staff of the paper, whereby my own task has been made so much the lighter. With regard to the future, without feeling it wise or necessary to enter upon a string of promises, I do nevertheless desire to assure the readers of the Musical Standard that the peculiarly independent position of the paper, with the assistance of a staff of able contributors accustomed to the advantage of the free, invigorating atmosphere of a journal which has no publishing or other musical interest to protect or forward, but which is devoted solely to the best and highest interests of the art and its followers, will be fully maintained and devoted as heretofore to the advancement of sound, good music, and to the use of all earnest artists both professional and amateur. In view of the earnest attitude I claim for the Musical Standard, a series of papers upon practical musical subjects will be presented for the reader's consideration from week to week. The concert criticisms and reviews of new music, etc., will continue to be based upon the same ground of practical investigation and independence from self interests of any kind whatever. The musical world, like all the other departments of life, has its tendencies to crystallisation into sets and cliques; a process resulting as elsewhere, in the creation of that elaborate form of selfishness known as class interest, and a process which may be and often is developed into a standing danger to the best interests of our national life and a weakness to the very society from which such faction interests themselves emanate. The articles devoted to the social and professional interests of our musical artists will be written, therefore, in the interests of all and not to the gain of the few. The subject of the development of church and organ music, and the due elevation of both these high departments of the art will still receive earnest attention in the columns of this paper. The advancement of orchestral music—without which no national musical life can be sound and healthy—will be unceasingly advocated. Our great educational institutions and other societies devoted to the art, will still command in the Musical Standard a full and fair consideration. In all matters discussed the best interests of the art and the social and professional gain of its followers—whether writers, executants, or teachers—will be duly borne in mind. And while fair criticism will be independently maintained, the maxim "Let those who "claim to be artists first learn to be gentlemen," will be kept well in sight, and all personalities or biassed opinions will still be rigorously excluded. It seems unnecessary to say so much as to one's future proposals; but I desire to inform my readers of my convictions, which arising from only a brief editorial experience of three years, are nevertheless firmly fixed upon my mind, that an art journal, like the artist himself, must to be useful be both earnest and practical. I can say no more; and now claim the privilege of heartily wishing my kind and indulgent readers every seasonable joy, and a Happy New Year.

THE LOGIC OF COUNTERPOINT.

THIRD SERIES.

XVIII.

THERE are two points in writing for more than four parts which call for the consideration of the student, both tending indeed to one end—the building up of harmony according to the natural harmonic scheme, whereby the harmonic strata stand more closely together in the upper than in the lower section of the score. In choosing voices for a score of five voices, therefore, the most favourable plan is that of having two trebles, and one of each of the other parts. When six parts are employed, then two trebles, two altos, one tenor, and one bass form the most effective score. Similarly in writing for seven voices, it is well to employ two representations of each of the three upper parts and one bass only. Of course there are times when the dramatic exigencies of a work or the peculiar formation of a choir may compel different and less advantageous groupings of the voices; but departures from the plans just recommended are apt to be more or less unsatisfactory in effect and difficult to write for with good results. In conducting Counterpoint in more than four, and even in eight parts, it is important to arrange the chords with the closest harmonic elements in the higher parts, and to further copy the natural scheme by taking care not to double the thirds needlessly. A good rule to lay down is to say that while in an eight part vocal score it is possible to simultaneously double in three octaves the foundation note or fifth of any chord, it is only possible to double the third in two octaves with due regard to clearness and properly balanced sonority. To sum up the principles of the contrapuntal science by which harmonic richness is secured in combination with melodic clearness, independence, and strength, it may be said that the chief tasks of the writer are the avoidance of such forms of consecution of perfect concords as result in palpable weakness or in prominences damaging to the harmonic effects, and in the proper and complete control and absorption of discordant elements. St. Paul tells us that the laws are for the wrong-doers and not for the righteous; so the rules of Counterpoint are merely for dangerous consecutives and unruly discords, and properly distributed concords are elements free from restraint. Then to get a general view of the main conditions of contrapuntal writing, the questions anent style must be borne in mind. These concern the purity of the melodies employed in musical lace-work, so to speak; in the homogeneity of the materials used; in the appropriateness of the sentences to the vocal or instrumental mediums of their exposition, and in their suitability to the thoughts embodied in the composition at large; and in the well-proportioned distribution of the contrapuntal activity in use. Good music has been forcibly spoken of as common-sense in sound; and let the composer duly remember that the use of that disciplined judgment ordinarily spoken of as common-sense, but really that uncommon form of practical wisdom which chiefly goes to make up the careers of good and useful people, is not only far more important than the exercise of technical knowledge, which is pedantic when it is wrongfully or ostentatiously applied, but this common-sense is the very essence itself of all the best learning and experience a life-time of earnest study can produce. The laws as mere verbal forms may indeed for the most part be forgotten with safety when the spirit they embody becomes a part of the composer's nature, when he writes not without the rays of light which the lamp of wisdom diffuses to those, who having mental gifts strengthen them by the exercise of good sense, earnestness, patience, and humility. With regret I lay the pen down with regard to the subject of these articles, which have, alas! for my readers' patience extended over so many pages, for I feel how unworthily I have dealt with a great subject. If I may tell the whole truth, I find some consolation in the thought that I may presently extend these observations to the kindred subjects of Double Counterpoint and Fugue; in which case I may again venture to make large claims upon the already well-tried and kindly extended patience of my readers.

Digitized by Google

MR. CHARLES E. STEPHENS'S SONATA PIACEVOLE.

A new work from the pen of this most popular and genial English musician is a most welcome appearance. The sonata, for flute and piano, was introduced by the composer and Herr Oluf Svendsen the other evening at the Musical Artists' Society's thirtieth performance of new compositions. Flautists possess anything but an abundance of duet sonatas; those, therefore, who are fortunate enough to be acquainted with a pianist able to render the elaborate and effective pianoforte part, may hail this addition to their store with peculiar satisfaction. Seldom has Mr. Stephens written in so happy a vein. The melodies bear the unmistakable stamp of spontaneity and genial simplicity; there is nothing forced or affected from the first bar to the last, and the pleasurable feeling of brightness and sunshine aroused by the opening subject continues in full force to the end.

Written strictly in orthodox form, with the modern device of reintroducing the first subject towards the end of the finale, the sonata aims at nothing higher (or lower) than it attains—the happy expression of happy thoughts. It is in three movements—an allegro grazioso, a romanza, and finale alla tarantella. Perhaps the first movement contains the writing most interesting to a musician: the return of the first subject after the "free fantasia" (to mention only one point), most cleverly and charmingly brought about. On the other hand, the romance is more likely to be popular; this movement might be introduced at a non-classical concert, and it would not fail to give pleasure to all listeners. Those musicians who are troubled with a mania for hunting out resemblances—it is a disease, like punning—may accuse the principal melody of this movement of having a likeness to "Robin Adair"; the chance resemblance does not, however, take from the merit or the beauty of the work. Judged as a whole, it not only far surpasses the few flute and piano sonatas one is familiar with (not forgetting the graceful specimens by Reissiger), but is worthy of an abiding and honourable place in the larger repertory of universal chamber music.

B. F. WYATT-SMITH.

On Dec. 20th, the nineteenth annual soirée and distribution of prizes in connection with the South London High Schools, took place in the great hall of the Cannon Street Hotel. The hall was very much overcrowded. The proceedings of the evening, however, passed off satisfactorily, and included an entertainment, consisting of a selection from the opera of "La Traviata" and a representation of the Opera Comique, "Rip Van Winkle," both performances being very creditable to the juvenile actors.

A goodly array of artists gave a concert at St. James' Hall on the 21st, in aid of the Christmas Dinner Fund of the Lodging House Mission.

Reviews.

Æsop's Fables, Versified and arranged for the pianoforte, by L. Williams (B. Williams).—An appropriate gift-book for children at this season of the year. The author has ingeniously versified some of these immortal fables, and set them to well-known tunes, for the most part, old favourites. The book is nicely illustrated, well got up, and moderate in price.

Dance Album. (B. Williams).—This last contribution to our store of dance-music is acceptable just now. It contains waltzes, quadrilles, polkas, a schottische, galop, and gavotte, the dancing of which stately measure is coming into vogue again. It suffices to say that the music is written by some of the best known composers, and is good; as the price of the nine pieces collectively amounts to one shilling, the volume will doubtless not lack purchasers

The Ebbing Tide. Elf Land. For the pianoforte, by J. F. Barnett (Patey & Willis).—These two clever and tastefully written tone-pictures, as the author terms them, were composed for orchestral use, and are now transcribed for the pianoforte. They are excellent specimens of Mr. Barnett's melodious and musicianly work, and must please all cultured players. The melody of "The Ebbing Tide" lies chiefly in the alto part, a delicate arpeggio figure above supplying an interesting accompaniment against soft chords in the bass. "Elf Land" was written for the strings of the orchestra alone, pizzicato. It is a delicious little fresh thought, skilfully and ingeniously laid out. Both pieces were recently played at one of the Crystal Palace Saturday concerts, and gained much applause; "Elf Land" being awarded an encore.

Fugue, composed by F. Westlake (Stanley, Lucas Weber and Co.)—This piece is really an octave study, in the fugal form. Though written in two parts only, it is effective, and well adapted for the purpose of giving elasticity and freedom to the wrists.

Menuet Impromptu, pour Piano, par Walter Macfarren (Stanley, Lucas, Weber and Co.)—One of the best pieces Mr. W. Macfarren has written. Its boldly marked subject is cleverly treated throughout the work, and the episodical theme in the major affords a capital and grateful contrast to the vigour of the main portion of the work, with its solid and effective full harmonies.

Ah! Fading Joy, Madrigal for five voices, composed by Charles Lucas (Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.)—A reprint of an excellent madrigal, by the late Principal of the R.A.M. It deserves to be still more widely known and sung by our madrigal and choral societies.

Gigue in G major, for the pianoforte, and Gavotte in D major, for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht (Duncan Davison, and Co., Regent Street)—Both these pieces have been played with great success by the gifted young composer at her recitals in Lowndes Square, Belgravia; where the reviewer had the pleasure to hear them. Mr. Duncan Davison has found some effective music in Miss Albrecht's numerous pieces, whereof he has published a tempting list for Christmas; many of the numbers are new editions, demanded by an eager public. The Gigue is in 6-8 time. The Gavotte begins, according to rule, on the second half of the bar. Miss Albrecht writes for her instrument with a loving regard for its genius, and never puts pen to paper, except to record worthy ideas.

La Caravane (March) and Sweet Dreams (Valse).—Mr. George Asch, a prolific writer of march and military music, publishes, through the medium of J. B. Cramer and Co., and Duff and Stewart, his Oriental March in C, "La Caravane," and a pretty Valse in B flat, "Sweet Dreams." These pieces have been played with great success at the Crystal Palace and the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, and won frequent encores, also at the Fisheries' Exhibition.

The fact that the theatre bands in New York, although limited, are, as a rule, well balanced, and served by artists of often more than merely respectable skill, affords one of many proofs that our cousins across the Atlantic possess a real and intelligent interest in the art.

Academical Intelligence.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Westmorland Scholarship was competed for the other day. There were 15 candidates, and the Scholarship was awarded to Eleanor Rees.

Our musical institutions holding examinations and granting diplomas—the Royal Academy of Music, the College of Organists, and Trinity College, London—will all be busy with examination work during the week beginning with Jan. 7th.

Foreign Musical Intelligence.

Boïto has finished a new opera, "Pierluigi Farnese."

Signor N. Coccon, of Venice, has written a new Mass for Christmastide.

Petrella's new operetta, the "Promesi Sposi," has been heard at Genoa.

A musical festival begins at Cincinnati on the very threshold of the new year.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's American friends seem to hope that his visit to New York will come off in the spring.

M. Saint-Saëns has been conducting two concerts of his own works, given in his honour by the people of Angers.

Madame Helen Hopekirk made her appearance in America at Boston on Dec. 8th, at one of the symphony concerts.

Before leaving Antwerp, M. Ambroise Thomas was made a citizen of that town, as a mark of appreciation of his musical services.

Herr Ludwig Christian Erk, well known as a composer and conductor, died on Nov. 25th in Berlin. He was born on Jan. 6th, 1807.

Liszt's new pianoforte method, to be issued shortly, it is said, in Leipzig, in three volumes, is reported to be a work of importance and value.

During the absence of Rubinstein, Leopold Auer, the violinist, is conducting the concerts given by the St. Petersburg Society of Music.

Signorina Luisa Cognetti, described as a pianist of singular merit and fine technical powers, has been playing with success in Florence.

There is a proposal, it is said, for a choir of 100 Welsh singers to come over from America to compete at the Liverpool Eisteddfod next year.

A symphony, called "Pologne," by Madame Augusta Holmes, created a marked impression at one of M. Pasdeloup's concerts in Paris recently.

The chief of the French Opera claque died the other day at the mature age of 90. It would be well now to do away with the claque altogether.

M. Massenet's new opera, "Manon," is now in full rehearsal at the Italian Theatre, Paris, and will probably be produced by the middle of January.

The festival at Boston, U.S., beginning on April 24th. will have a good presentation of Wagner's music, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas.

Under the title of "Note di un Pianista," M. Gottschalk contributes to La Gazetta Musicale di Milano some of his artistic experiences in foreign lands.

A "Church Choir Society" has been formed in New York, consisting of choristers and others interested in the cause for the advancement and popularization of church music.

Flotow's opera "Marta" was performed at the Italian Opéra in Paris, last week. Ravelli the tenor, and Reszki the baritone, won the honours of the evening.

Mr. Mapleson is now announced as the purchaser of the partly-built Opera House on the Thames Embankment, and he proposes, it is said, to now finish the structure.

Mr. Villiers Stanford's new opera on the capital subject of the "Canterbury Pilgrims" will, it is hoped, be heard early in the Carl Rosa opera season of next year in London.

Herr Gustavus Hoelz died recently, aged 70. He has been called the Austrian Béranger, and was the author and composer of many popular Austrian songs.

"Estrella," a comic opera by Mr. Luscombe Sarelle, was announced by Messrs. Brooks and Dickson for production, for the first time in America, on Dec. 10th.

Madame Patti created a new success in New York in Verdi's "Aïda." Signor Nicolini has largely gained in artistic reputation during the New York opera season.

There are signs that even rich and liberal New York cannot support two Italian opera houses. The Mapleson party have left the coast clear by a tour to Philadelphia and Boston, but propose to return to New York in January.

Selections from Wagner's operas will be given during a tour in the United States of Mr. Theodore Thomas, with Frau Friedrich Materna and Herren Winkelman and Scaria, together with a complete and competent orchestra.

Last Friday, at the Grand Opéra, Paris, a pretty ballet by Dubois, called "Farandole," was produced with success. The libretto is from the pen of M. Mortier, a theatrical critic. Mdlle. Rosita Mauri, a most graceful artist, was twice encored.

Popular concerts are greatly in vogue at Turin. They are given in the Victor-Emmanuel Theatre, a large building capable of holding several thousand people. The orchestra, 90 strong, is conducted by Signor Fasso, and the programmes are arranged to suit all tastes.

"Don Giovanni," "Rigoletto," "Lohengrin," "Lucia," "Aïda," "I Puritani," "La Traviata," and "Faust," have recently delighted the people of New York, who, though presumedly smitten with Wagnerism, find Italian opera delightfully pleasant, notwithstanding its artificialities. Tune, "pure and simple," is something.

At the second concert of the New York Symphony Society, on Dec. 8th, the programme included Tschaikowsky's symphony in C, Beethoven's grand Quatuor in C sharp minor, scored for orchestra by Carl Mueller-Berghaas, and three pieces for string orchestra by J. S. Bach. Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" was also given.

Paolo Fodale has been criticising a new method with regard to the employment of the chromatic genus on the pianoforte, and a new system of writing music by Bartolemeo Grassi-Landi. The critic goes minutely into the proposed reform of the chromatic methods, and the substitution of a new system in place of the scales as now used. He states the new system to be based upon a chromatic scale formed in harmony with the diatonic system, and evidently believes the proposed new scale plan will offer more scope in the musical art for the creation of new effects, and present a clearer definition of the tone affinities.

As an instance of the sound artistic feeling of the late tenor, Mario, it may be related that he once objected to the somewhat heavy accompaniments of the "Cujus animam" of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" being unduly subdued on his account; pointing out that the accompanying forces had to realise on their part an artistic and powerful effect, and that if his voice was no longer equal to the full enunciation of his part, that was not their business, they had their own duties to fulfil. Though one may not care for too noisy an accompaniment, the spirit of the great artist's words forms a striking rebuke to our many vain singers, "a feeble folk," who have an unrighteous horror of any, often necessary and often artistic, climax power in their accompaniments.

The Arpa of Bologna gives an account of the present condition of the Liceo Musicale in that city. The institution has 233 students, and is clearly in a prosperous condition. A very notable feature of its work is the large percentage of students of orchestral instruments numbering some 92 scholars. Would that our English institutions showed less singers and pianists on their student lists, and more orchestral players. The singing students of Bologna number only about 49, the pianoforte, less cultivated in Italy than in some musical countries, has some 46 aspirants; the organ, 15. The students of composition are: harmony, 11; counterpoint, the goodly number of 25, a creditable fact in modern Italy; and the general principles of composition, as form, are being studied by three scholars The professonal staff is an efficient one.

BOSTON (U.S.) EXHIBITION.

Music and musical instruments are well represented at the Foreign Exhibition, now being held in Boston. England, it will be observed, is only represented by one firm.

In the Italian Department there are various works on Music, from Giusto Dacci, director of the Royal School of Music, Parma. These works include treatises on Vocalization, Harmony, etc. Santucci (Verona) contributes musical instruments.

Germany sends a concert piano with harmonium attachment, exhibited by Phillipp (Forst, Deutschland); piano, from Schuabe (Berlin); concert piano, complete iron frame, case carved Renaissance style; accordeons, harmonicas, etc., from Bufe (Gera Unterhaus); zither, Tiefenbrunner (Munich).

Holland: Thirty volumes of Music for piano, guitar, etc., Buhrmann (Amsterdam).

France: Musical instruments, harmonichords, Lauvet (Paris); musical works, with and without illustrations, Hennuyer (Paris); opera glasses, Avizard (Paris); musical instruments, Courtois (Paris).

England: Works on Music, Trübner (London).

Canada: Organs, Bell (Guelph).

East Indies: Indian musical instruments; drawing-room instruments played upon with a steel plectrum; Kachua Setar, owing its name to the shape of the gourd, which is flat, like the back of a tortoise, the instrument being a classical one; class B includes instruments played upon with a wooden plectrum; class C, those played with two small sticks; D, played upon with the bow; and E, played with the tips of the fingers. In this exhibit there are also wind instruments, percussion instruments made of metals, pulsatile instruments covered with skin, etc. In all, there are 50 instruments. Among them is the Nyaataranga. It is believed that an instrument of this description is scarcely to be met with in any other part of the world than India. It is known in Sanscrit as the Upanga, and is extensively used by Hindu musicians in the North-Western Provinces, particularly at Mathura and Brindaban. The East Indian exhibit also includes works on music by Tagore and others.

Japan: Piano, from Kuaisha (Tokio).

Austria: Harmonicas, Brumbauer (Vienna); musical instruments and strings, Lutz (Vienna); instruments, Riedl (Graslitz); harmonicas, Thie (Vienna).

Sweden: Violins, Amati model, Leonardson (Orebo).

Spain: Musical instrument strings, Marti (Barcelona).

THE NATIONAL OPERA HOUSE.

The recently issued report of the architect, Mr. Fowler, upon the proposed completion of the National Opera House on the Embankment, the first stone of which was laid by the Prince of Wales eight years ago, gives particulars regarding the structure of the building and the objects to which it is to be dedicated. In the event of the projected completion being accomplished, Fifty thousand pounds have already been expended upon it, but the owners have agreed to grant a lease of the building as it stands, and so much of the site as is required for it, for £15,000, to be paid on completion in boxes or stalls. The estimated cost of completion is £55,000, but it is now proposed that the building shall be on a less elaborate scale than was intended, both as regards the interior and exterior, though it is to have the same spacious internal accommodation. It will be larger even than "La Scala," but very similar in design. Altogether, it will provide comfortable accommodation for about 3,000 persons, a larger number than can be accommodated in the Grand Opéra in Paris. Of these one thousand persons will be in the gallery. It is calculated that this great accommodation will permit the lessee to give opera at half the present Italian opera prices. The structure will be fire-proof, and will comprise a promenade, refreshment rooms, and smoking divan on a grand scale. It is contemplated that access shall be given from the District Railway by a covered way. It is said to be Mr. Mapleson's intention to give Italian, French, or German opera during the summer season. During the spring and autumn it will be devoted to English opera, while at Christmas it will pass into the hands of "an English theatrical manager, under whose care the national drama is to be cultivated."

A very pleasant evening was spent on Saturday at the Freemasons' Tavern by the members of the Council of the Artists' Annuity Fund, and their guests. The form of entertainment was that of a "smoking concert," at which a number of excellent soloists and the St. Paul's choir assisted. Some very good recitations were also delivered. The walls of the room were hung with pictures, including some original sketches by the Queen and the members of the Royal Family.

"Die Pomposaner," a new opera by Max Leythœuser, editor of the Würzburger Presse, was well received on its first performance in Würzburg recently.

Correspondence.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—Your current number has a kindly written notice of this Society, for which we are grateful; but the following paragraphs call for some remarks and explanation.

"The conductor was Signor Randegger. Why a foreign "musician should have been selected to conduct the performance "of a work Englishmen best know the traditions of, for a pro-"fessedly national Society, is one of the mysteries of art in "England by which the alien is being constantly exalted and "benefited to the neglect and loss of the native professor. "Without knowing who are the members of the Royal Society "of Musicians, the writer does know that no large body of "English musicians can exist without counting a dozen or "twenty, or perhaps more, natives who could conduct the "'Messiah' quite as well, doubtless, as the esteemed foreign "teacher who was chosen for this duty the other evening. "However, it may be assumed that the Committee do not run "out of their way to find aliens to accept pensions, intended, it "may be presumed for British artists."

We scarcely regard Mr. (not Signor) Randegger as a foreigner, for he has been domiciled in England many years, and has long been a good friend to the Royal Society of Musicians, as is proved by the annual subscription list. The Society was founded by natives and foreigners (40 of the latter were included in the first roll of members), for the benefit of both; the condition, that the claim for the bounty of the Society should be founded on membership and actual need. A section of the 1st Law declares, that "A Candidate (for membership) being a foreigner, must have practised music for a maintenance in Great Britain, at least seven years immediately preceding" his nomination.

Our history tells us that the first recipients of aid from the Society's funds were the orphan children of Kytch, the oboe player, a German.

The Society is greatly indebted to foreigners for handsome donations; for example: Storace (1793), £100; Signora Storace (1820), £1,000; Mazzinghi (1844), £100; Begrez (1864), £1,000; Schultz (1877), £1,000; with the exception of two, all members of the Society. We also gratefully record a donation (1862) of £441 18s. 2d. from Mdme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, and M. Otto Goldschmidt.

With every sympathy for nationality, and a desire to see Englishmen "always to the fore," I should be sorry if a wrong impression respecting the un-selfish benevolence of the Founders, and present members of the Royal Society of Musicians, were to get abroad.

If our talented English musicians, on attaining the age of 21,* would make it their pride and their duty to become members of the Society, they would spare themselves, and those dear to them, many an anxious hour; and would do something to aid in comforting the orphan and widow in the time of need and affliction.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS,
Hon. Treasurer, Royal Soc. of Mus.

CURIOSITIES OF MUSICAL CRITICISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL STANDARD."

SIR,—In your issue of the Musical Standard for Dec. 15th, I find the following with reference to M. de Pachmann's playing of Schumann's "Carnaval":—"M. de Pachman's version of the 'Carnaval', ought to have satisfied the most exacting, and probably did so." In the Athenæum of the same date, the critic, a well-known and able authority, says: "M. de Pachman's worst performance was that of the 'Carnaval.' Not only was his reading of this work eccentric to an extraordinary degree, but it was persistently inaccurate in a technical sense, while the wilful alterations of the composer's text were altogether without justification. Judged by this alone, the player would be unworthy of serious criticism." The Academy of the same date says: "We did not expect to hear of a travesty of 'The Carnaval;' technically, intellectually and poetically, the performance was unsatisfactory."

Yours,

Dec. 18, 1883. A. R. A. M.

P.S.—I may add that I entirely coincide with the views of the two critics above quoted.

A pleasant feature of the Christmas music arrangements will be the singing of carols on the 29th (to-day), at Westminster Abbey by the fine choir after the three o'clock service.

* Candidates for membership must be over 21 and under 45 years of age.

Passing Events.

Dr. John Hullah, though not quite recovered from his recent illness, is somewhat better.

Mr. W. Ganz gave a matinée musicale at his residence on the 19th inst., his pupils being the performers.

The London Tonic Sol-fa soirée will be held at 6 p.m. on Jan. 5th, at the Falcon Square Chapel, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

The deaths of Dr. C. W. Corfe (formerly organist of Oxford Cathedral), and of Mr. Henry Corri (a well-known English bass singer) at Philadelphia, are announced with regret.

In the December number of the Boston, U.S. Musical Record Mr. Hamilton C. Macdougall, of Providence, U.S., gives an animated and pleasant account of his successful experience of an English Examination at the College of Organists.

It is pleasant to read, that at the performances of "As you like it," at Dulwich College, Dr. Arne's "Under the greenwood tree," and Stevens' glee, "Blow, blow," were sung by the performers, and the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. J. Brabham, played a selection of music in the interval.

The Keynote is the title of a new American journal, apparently succeeding the New York Music and Drama. It is well got up, with an effective front page; and, what is still more to the point, it contains practical and spirited articles and criticisms. Mr. Frederick Archer, the eminent organist, is the editor. No. 3 contains Mr. E. Prout's valuable article on Handel's Chandos Anthems.

The music for the cantata, which will form an important feature of the ceremonial upon the opening day of the forthcoming International Exhibition at the Crystal Palace, which is fixed for St. George's Day, April 23, will be composed by Sir George Alexander Macfarren. The display of foreign exhibits will be large and varied, and there is every probability of most of the principal countries of Europe and Asia being well represented. Negotiations are on foot to secure collections of Belgian, French, German, Spanish, and Swedish pictures; and it is hoped that there will be a goodly representation of the works of British artists. And it may be further hoped that an important collection of musical instruments will be exhibited.

On Dec. 19th, Prof. J. Ella reached the age of 81, his birthday being duly honoured by many artistic and notable friends. He is the only survivor of the Italian Opera band of 1821. The late Sir John Goss and Prof. Ella, both pupils of Attwood, were elected together in 1824 members of the Royal Society of Musicians, and since the death of Sir John Goss, Mr. Ella is now the senior member of that excellent institution; also since the death of the late Dr. Stebbing, the veteran artist is the only survivor of the staff of the Athenæum newspaper of some sixty years ago. Of the distinguished artists who appeared at the first season of the Musical Union in 1845, the following are still living, viz., Sivori, Sainton, Lazarus, Osborne, and Sir Julius Benedict. Within the present week has died one of the most zealous members of the Musical Union, Lady Mary Christopher Nisbet Hamilton, at the age of 82, who with her only daughter, now living, seldom failed to be present at the matinées.

The Christmas music has not presented any marked novelties this year. In London, Paris, and other great cities, carol singing on Christmas eve, midnight Masses, and celebrations, have taken place, to be followed by New Year's Eve midnight services. Sensible people of all religious bodies protest that man is not the slave of time but the servant of the ever-living God; and that the watching of the clock at midnight savours either of superstitious observance or of that love of excitement which better characterises the Salvation Army than a body of sensible Christians who build up their faith upon the free gifts promised by the scriptures. This year carol singing has been heard in London, and will be heard at the Abbey to-day after the three o'clock service, truly a sensible hour. In Paris carols were sung, notably at St. Eustache and of a more modern type, some written by Adolphe Adam, says report, at the Madaleine and Trinity Church. That common-sense will in time teach us to dispense with public religious services held when the body is fatigued and the mind unduly excited, is a result devoutly to be hoped for, surely.

M. Henri Logé, an admirable pianist, gave a recital the other day at St. George's Hall, Langham Place, playing a good programme, including some of his own pieces.

The story of Mdme. Patti being vain enough to wear some £50,000 worth of diamonds in "La Traviata," and her being attended by four detectives, is going the round of the papers.

During the season at the Royal Institution, Professor Ernst Pauer will give six lectures on "The History and Development of the Music for the Pianoforte and its Predecessors, the Clavecin, Harpsichord, &c."

On Friday, Dec. 21st, a special evening service was held at Sherborne Abbey, at which the choir, strengthened for the occasion, sang most of the first or Christmas part of the "Messiah," concluding with the "Hallelujah" Chorus.

An annual Christmas performance of the "Messiah" was given by the South London Choral Association on Dec. 21st. The soloists were Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Sneddon, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. James Budd; the band and chorus numbered about 220. The performance was under the able conductorship of Mr. Leonard C. Venables.

Many theatre-goers will be inclined to agree to the abolition of out of place music between the acts of a drama. The question has been raised by Liszt. The Comédie Française, Paris, still follows the old custom of the playhouse of Molière, according to old tradition, with no music between the acts. Perhaps, however, if proper care were taken to always select music appropriate to the closing sentiments of the preceding act, and to secure its adequate rendition, the musical entr'acte might still survive as an institution, not without value.

The concert given at the Royal Hospital, City Road, on Wednesday, Dec. 19th, by Lady Brabazon, was a great treat to the audience. It was a well-arranged programme and amongst the most successful songs were the "Mermaid," "John Olden," and "Bonnie Dundee," all sung by Mr. Bishenden, the spirited chorus of the last named song being especially well received. Mr. Smith, a tenor with a well trained voice, distinguished himself in "I'm waiting." Miss Grey and Miss Chure also sang, and Mr. Thornell gave recitations in a highly finished manner. Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction.

The authorities at Durham have not, it appears, satisfied the people with regard to a new arrangement of the Sunday morning services at the Cathedral, in view of lightening what even very orthodox people of the city call a "long, wearisome service." The cry is now at Durham, "We want shorter sermons." Every one knows that the three services in one on Sunday morning, to which is tacked on the Puritanical lecture-sermon, is a matter calling for division or revision; and any movement which will secure a better arrangement, and compel, by force of public opinion, shorter sermons, will be a distinct gain to the Church. The musical services in Durham Cathedral are served by a choir of exceptionally fine voices.

The Querist.

QUERY.

ORGAN MUSIC.—Will anyone kindly inform me who are the publishers of the organ music of Sir R. P. Stewart, Mus.Doc., and Morandi.—A. SUBSCRIBER.

[Sir R. P. Stewart's organ music (alas! that so little of it is in print) may be obtained at Novello's for the most part. Some of it appears in "The Organist's Quarterly Journal," and in "English Organ Music." Morandi's organ works are published by Ricordi (Regent Street)].—ED. Mus. Stand.

OCARINA.—Can you, or any of your readers inform me if the ocarina is a moderately easy instrument to learn; for one who understands music, how long would it take? also, if there are different kinds and which kind and tone are the best.—A. H. F.

[The ocarina is not a difficult instrument to learn, but it would be well to remember that instruments of easy mastery are of poor resources; and of single-toned instruments, those employed in the orchestra are not only the most perfect, but their study best advances the art. The larger sized ocarinas are, probably, the best. Keith, Prowse and Co., 48, Cheapside, would probably give all particulars].—ED. Mus. Stand.
